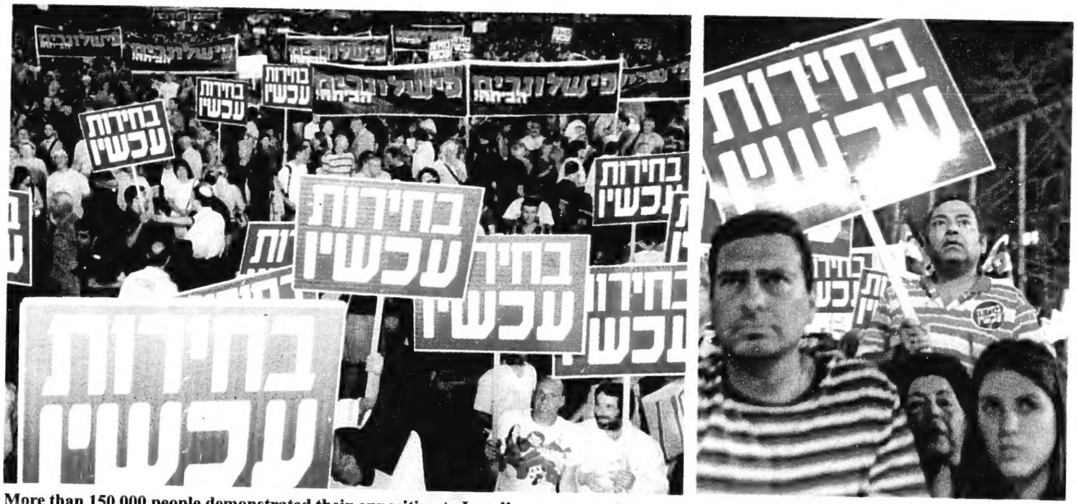
Emphatic call for new elections



More than 150,000 people demonstrated their opposition to Israel's government last week at a rally in Tel Aviv. They were responding to the findings of the interim Winograd report, which were harshly critical of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. The protesters called for elections to be called immediately. Please see related stories on pages 4, 10, 11, 13, 24 and 39.

Ontario gives UJA Federation $15 million grant for new JCCs

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has received $15 million from the Ontario government to help cover the capital costs on the three campuses that are part of the federation's Tomorrow campaign.

The grant, which may be precedent-setting in size, comprises by far the largest chunk of the $20,395,000 being given this year by the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration to 31 recipients "to promote Ontario's diversity and heritage, community involvement, volunteer participation and celebrating Ontario's cultural mosaic" – the reason for the allocation given on a government website.

If the amount does set a precedent, it's because Toronto's federation has undertaken an unprecedented project, said federation spokesperson Howard English. "It's the first development of three separate campuses across a vast area for a huge metropolis."

The grant comes from a controversial pool of money in the March 31 budget that opposition parties allege is a "slush fund" that benefited groups with Liberal ties. The grant is being earmarked primarily for the Jewish community centres on the three campuses, English said. They are the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre in downtown Toronto, a new JCC that will replace the current Bathurst Jewish Community Centre on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard Avenue, and another to be built on the new Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

The cost of renovations to the Nadal JCC was almost $18 million, with $14 million raised to date; the cost of the new mid-town JCC

The News in Brief

CANADA

Murder Trial Begins

NEWMARKET, Ont. — After the Crown rejected his guilty plea to the lesser charge of manslaughter, the man accused in the 2005 killing of his next-door neighbour Alicia Ross went on trial last week for second-degree murder. Daniel Sylvester, now 33, turned himself in to police five weeks after Ross, 25, disappeared from her Thornhill, Ont., home in August 2005. Police were then led to her remains in two locations some 40 and 50 kilometres north of Toronto. Jury selection began April 30. The trial is expected to last eight weeks.

Candidate Resigns

OTTAWA — A Liberal candidate for the next federal election who once accused Israel of terrorism resigned last week. Farhan Chak, who was nominated in an Edmonton riding, came under fire for his political views and after it was revealed he claimed to have a PhD that he hadn't earned. In a 2002 letter to the Edmonton Journal, he accused Israel of "terrorism, massacres and savagery" in the West Bank and Gaza, and of the "pillage, the rape and enslavement of an entire populace." In other letters to the paper, he said India has committed "gross human rights violations" in the disputed province of Kashmir, Canadian Press reported.

Killer's Appeal Denied

TORONTO — An appeal by one of the men convicted in the 1999 killing of teen Matti Baranovski was denied last week by the Ontario Court of Appeal. A three-judge panel of the province's highest court rejected arguments by Meir Mariani's lawyers challenging the trial judge's instructions to the jury and the fact a Crown witness was cross-examined for prior inconsistent statements, Canadian Press reported. Baranovski died after being punched and kicked in the head in a Toronto park over a pack of cigarettes.

Leader Apologizes

OTTAWA — After receiving a letter from Canadian Jewish Congress, Green Party leader Elizabeth May apologized last week for citing a British author who compared Ottawa's new environmental policies to British prime minister Neville Chamberlain's appeasement of the Nazis in the 1930s. May made the reference in an April 29 address in London, Ont. CEO Bernie Farber said May called Congress to retract and apologize for her comments, Canadian Press reported.

Koufax Selected in Israeli League Draft

NEW YORK — Power-hitting outfielder Aaron Levin, 22, was the first player selected in the Israel Baseball League's inaugural draft April 26 in New York City. Levin, of California's Contra Costa Community College, was selected by the Modi'in Miracles.

Sandy Koufax

With the final pick of the draft, the Miracles chose Sandy Koufax, the former Los Angeles Dodger lefthander and Hall of Famer, who famously refused to pitch in a World Series game on Yom Kippur. He retired in 1966 at age 30 because of arthritis.

It's unclear if Koufax, 71, will actually suit up for the team. "His selection is a tribute to the esteem with which he is held by everyone associated with this league," the Miracles manager, former big leaguer Art Shamsky, said. "It's been 41 years between starts for him. If he's rested and ready to take the mound again, we want him on our team."

The IBL will play a 42-game schedule starting June 24. Players from around the world were drafted, but roughly half the league will be made up of Jews, its founders said.

WORLD

Attack Investigated

MARSEILLE — A French prosecutor confirmed that an attack on a Jewish woman was anti-Semitic in nature. Audrey Brachelle, 22, was attacked April 26 by two youths at a Marseille metro station. The prosecutor said an investigation began April 30 into "thefts and violence with weapon and with racist acts." Brachelle, an economics student, was heading to work when two youths demanded her cellphone and bag. When they saw her Star of David necklace, they yelled that it was a sign of the devil, then took out a knife, tore her shirt, painted a swastika on her stomach and cut off some of her hair. Brachelle said she also was hit several times and thrown to the floor.

Record Camp Gift

NEW YORK — An anonymous Chicago businessman gave $15 million to the Foundation for Jewish Camping (FJC). The gift, believed to be a record for Jewish camping, will help boost participation in U.S. overnight Jewish camps, the FJC said. The FJC and the Jewish Funders Network want to raise $50 million by 2012 to double the number of campers at Jewish overnight camps. Some 62,000 U.S. kids attend 130 not-for-profit Jewish overnight camps annually.

Last Shoah restitution office in Canada closes

Federation hires former employee to help survivors

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Canadian Holocaust survivors have expressed concern that the closing of the United Restitution Organization office in Toronto last month – the last one in Canada – will have harmful consequences, but Jewish community spokespeople are assuring them that they have nothing to fear.

Founded in the late 1940s as a legal aid society to help survivors claim restitution and compensation from Germany, the URO established a presence in Canada in 1953 under the aegis of the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Offices were opened in Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg and Vancouver to assist the estimated 13,000 survivors who settled in Canada after World War II.

As some of the survivors passed on, URO branches in Winnipeg and Vancouver were closed in the 1970s.

In 2002, the Montreal branch was also closed, leaving the Toronto office as the sole remaining one in the country.

The Toronto office, with its two employees, was officially closed on April 1, but UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has tried to ease the pain by hiring a Toronto URO employee, Dora Elzbet, to continue helping survivors.

"We consider this a crucial service for survivors, who deserve all the assistance that we can provide," said federation spokesperson Howard English.

"All I can say is that survivors are of great concern to us, and we will do everything in our power to see that they are well taken care of," said Lorraine Sandler, the chair of UJA's Holocaust Centre. "I will be very, very watchful and concerned about their well-being."

She added, "I can't throw up my hands and shout gevalt, but there is something in place to deal with the situation."

Survivors were not as sanguine.

"It's a bad thing," said Michael Rosenberg, the former president of the Jewish Holocaust Survivors of Canada. "Survivors need an office where they can pour out their hearts and receive assistance. There are a lot of impoverished survivors, and they are not being looked after."

He praised Elzbet as a dedicated case worker, but he said she will no longer be able to provide sufficient and timely services, since her assistant was let go.

"The workload can't be handled by one person," said Rosenberg, an 81-year old survivor who immigrated to Canada from Poland in 1948 and made a career as a printer.

"Suppose Toronto closed all the emergency rooms in hospitals due to a lack of funds? This is tantamount to the closing of Toronto's URO office."

Elzbet, a child of survivors, voiced confidence that she will have no problem delivering services to survivors on the same level as before.

"I basically carried the whole load myself," said Elzbet, who began working for URO in 1982. "I saw thousands of survivors every year."

English said the decision to close the Toronto office was taken by URO International, based in Israel.

Efforts to reach URO International in Israel failed, but Nathan Leipciger – a 79-year-old, Toronto-based member of its board and a survivor of the Auschwitz concentration camp – said that the dwindling number of claims filed by local survivors made it economically imperative to close the Toronto office.

Leipciger said that all of URO's worldwide offices, with the exception of the one in New York City, have been closed, including those in Israel.

He added that survivors in Toronto should not worry, since the federation office staffed by Elzbet will tend to their needs.

Five days before the cease-fire with Lebanon, First Lieutenant Asa'el Lubotsky's life was changed forever when a missile hit his armored personnel carrier (APC).

"Suddenly, I noticed a glare of light coming from a few hundred metres away. Seconds later, I heard the boom on the back side of the APC. All of us were instantly wounded ...

I was transported back to Israel on a stretcher inside a tank. I was fully conscious the entire way and felt unbearable pain in my legs.

"The bones were crushed, and the only thing that kept my right leg together were some pieces of flesh."

My regiment suffered many casualties. Visions of my friends' bodies being evacuated from Bint Jebeil cross my mind all the time. I am lucky that I got my life back ... I am lucky that I have Beit Halochem where I know that people care about me and want to help me get better."

Members from Beit Halochem Israel visited Asa'el and other injured soldiers in the hospital regularly. Our members also showed them Beit Halochem's rehabilitation, sports and cultural Centres in Jerusalem, Haifa, Tel Aviv and Nahariya — giving our heroes the hope, moral support and information needed to deal with their new disabilities.

In 2006, Beit Halochem Israel welcomed over 1,200 wounded members, bringing the total number of Israeli disabled veterans and victims of terror to over 51,000!

More than a 'report'

From the editor's desk

Those who focus on the substantive recommendations alone of the Winograd Commission's interim report will have missed a key aspect of the commission's investigative, advisory process.

To be sure, the conclusions regarding the decision-making by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Amir Peretz and former Israel Defence Forces chief of staff Dan Halutz before and during the Second Lebanon War are compelling reading. Moreover, they are important conclusions. The commissioners pulled no punches in describing what, in their minds, were unacceptable performance of duties.

But the commission's approach to its work and the conclusions it reached are indicative of the vein of purpose and values through which courses the regenerative strength and resilience of Israeli society.

The commissioners did not confine their mandate or their investigations to the vital, though narrower, questions that dealt with the "mechanics" and "conduct" of the war.

The members of the commission are: the chair, retired justice Eliyahu Winograd; professor of law Ruth Gavison; Prof. Yehezkel Dror; and retired military officers Menachem Einan and Chaim Nadel.

All of the commission members are at a stage in life where they no longer need to establish "credentials." Their achievements are well chronicled, their knowledge, experience and wisdom widely respected.

Space does not allow us to reprint the interim report in the pages of the paper. Thus, we can only reprint the following mini-excerpts.

They speak to a farther horizon and higher purpose toward which the commissioners are aiming Israeli society.

That these aspirations appear at all in an investigation and report ostensibly of a military "failure," is remarkable.

Throughout the report, the commissioners always direct their observations back to the larger picture, a picture in which the performances of the high military and the political echelons are but a reflection back of the deep sinew and fibre that holds all of society together.

When it is released, the final report will undoubtedly be required reading for anyone interested in trying to understand how to cobble together the vast requirements for building the very best society possible.

"We accepted this difficult task as both a duty and a privilege. It is our belief that the larger the event and the deeper the feeling of crisis, the greater the opportunity to change and improve matters which are essential for the security and the flourishing of the state and society in Israel. We believe Israeli society has a robust sense of the justice of its being and of its achievements. These, too, were expressed during the war in Lebanon and after it. At the same time, we must not underrate deep failures among us.

"This emphasis on learning lessons does not only follow from our conception of the role of a public commission. It also follows from our belief that one of Israeli society's greatest sources of strength is its being free, open and creative. Together with great achievements, the challenges facing it are existential. To cope with them, Israel must be a learning society – a society which examines its achievements and, in particular, its failures, in order to improve its ability to face the future.

"We would like to reiterate and emphasize that we hope that this partial report, which concentrates on the functioning of the highest political and military echelons in their decision to move into the war will not divert attention from the overall troubling complete picture revealed by the war as a whole.

"As a result of our investigation, we make a number of structural and institutional recommendations (my emphasis) that require urgent attention:

"We believe that – beyond the important need to examine the failures of conducting the war and the preparation for it, beyond the need to identify the weaknesses (and strengths) in the decisions made in the war… there are questions that go far beyond the mandate of this or that commission of inquiry; they are the questions that stand at the centre of our existence here as a Jewish and democratic state. (My emphasis.)

"It would be a grave mistake to concentrate only on the flaws revealed in the war and not to address these basic issues.

"We hope that our findings and conclusions in the interim report and in the final report will not only impel taking care of the serious governmental flaws and failures we examine and expose, but will also lead toward a renewed process in which Israeli society, and its political and spiritual leaders, will take up and explore Israel's long-term aspirations and the ways to advance them." –MBD

Darfur a ‘genocide by attrition,’ Cotler says

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Former justice minister sets out 10-point action plan

There wasn't a lot of good news at a recent event to mobilize a public campaign to support an end to the violence in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Some important steps were noted – the agreement by the government of Sudan to allow for an expanded African Union/United Nations protection force; a Sudanese official and janjaweed militiaman have been charged in connection with atrocities – but Darfuris continue to be murdered, raped and dispossessed.

Two speakers, MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler and Georgette Gagnon, deputy director of the Africa division of Human Rights Watch (HRW), urged approximately 100 people in attendance to call on the government of Canada to step up its efforts to help the people of Darfur. They were addressing an event at the downtown Spoke Club sponsored by HRW's Toronto network.

Both agreed, however, that the international community has done too little to prevent the mass slaughter of civilians by a militia closely aligned with the government in Khartoum.

Speaking shortly before Global Day for Darfur, a day of international protests that coincided with the fourth anniversary of the start of the conflict, Cotler called the Darfur situation a “genocide by attrition, a go-slow genocide.”

A longtime human rights advocate, Cotler noted that during the most recent federal election campaign, none of the party leaders mentioned the crisis in Darfur and the media failed to pose a single question on the topic.

“It just wasn't on the radar screen,” he said.

What is needed now, he continued, was “immediate, concerted international action to save the people of Darfur.”

Cotler, who acknowledged that the Liberal government in which he served should have done more for Darfur, said events in the western region of Sudan are “a repudiation of the responsibility to protect doctrine” – which allows outside states the right to intervene in the internal affairs of countries that are not protecting their own people – as well as a “betrayal of the people of Darfur.”

Like the genocide in Rwanda, “we knew and we did not act.”

Gagnon noted that the ruling elite in Khartoum supported the janjaweed militia in their “brutal war against the people of Darfur.” That included “scorched earth ethnic cleansing,” mass murder, rapes and brutalization.

She discounted Sudanese denials of complicity in the crimes, saying the government has not stopped the attacks, which she said have claimed 200,000 lives and left more than two million homeless and dependent on international relief. (Cotler suggested the number of dead has climbed to 400,000.)

Gagnon called for more international pressure on Sudan to accept an expanded protection force, as well as effectively enforced sanctions against the regime.

She urged the Canadian government to call on the International Criminal Court (ICC) to prosecute Sudanese officials and for an increase in financial and technical support to African Union (AU) forces that are already in Darfur until the enhanced force can take over.

Cotler set out a 10-point action plan, at the centre of which was Canadian government resolve to show international leadership on the Darfur file.

Among his points:

- put a hybrid AU/UN protection force on the ground to stop the killing. Don't allow “the genocidaires” in Khartoum to determine how and when that force is deployed.
- Enhance the existing AU force with more troops and support until the new force can be put in place. Canada should take the lead in that effort.
- Urge the UN Security Council to impose tough sanctions on Sudan as well as impose a no-fly zone to end the indiscriminate bombing of Darfur refugees by government forces.
- Bring senior Sudanese officials before the ICC.
- Pressure China, a UN Security Council member. China is Sudan's “paymaster” thanks to its interests in Sudanese oil fields. Shame the Chinese by referring to the upcoming Olympics as the “Genocide Olympics.”
- Press the International Monetary Fund make debt relief conditional on action to stop the genocide in Darfur.
- Begin a divestment campaign from companies that do business in Sudan.

Canada should use its influence in international forums to take action against Sudan, Cotler stated. If we don't, “by our inaction we are being complicit.”

Conflict of interest cited in grant to federation

A grassroots debate in Toronto's Jewish community is percolating over the handling of the $15-million grant received by UJA Federation from the provincial Liberals in the March 31 budget.

Jewish advocates for equal school funding say they want organizations such as Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to use some of the money on more aggressive, public campaigns to pressure the Liberals into softening their position on private school funding, particularly during the run-up to the Oct. 10 provincial election.

Some say they're also concerned that the $15 million may hamstring advocacy efforts by federation and CJC on funding non-Catholic, faith-based schools, saying the money puts the Jewish groups in a conflict of interest.

Federation denies this and says the grant is earmarked for ongoing work on the Jewish community campuses in Vaughan, mid-town and downtown that are part of its Jewish Toronto Tomorrow project, as well as other future initiatives.

Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding for Faith-Based Schools, expressed doubts about how effective federation's advocacy for faith-based funding will now be.

"The biggest problem, by far [in the Jewish community] is the high cost of tuition fees. I think that is where the money should be going to first and foremost," he told The CJN last week.

"I'm worried that there will be a perception among many people, real or imaginary, that there is a conflict of interest in one organization taking money from a government that they claim to be advocating [against]. Maybe what they should be doing is have an independent organization take the lead."

Walfish added that he doesn't object to the federation securing funds for important projects.

"On the contrary, that's their job… it's what they should be doing for the community. But not [spearheading] advocacy for school funding," he said.

The website of the Ministry of Citizenship and Immigration, which handled the grants, describes them as intended to "promote Ontario's diversity and heritage, community involvement, volunteer participation and celebrating Ontario's cultural mosaic."

In a May 2 Toronto Star column by Ian Urquhart, federation spokesperson Howard English is quoted as saying that the provincial grant "won't prevent us from advocating for fair funding for faith-based schools."

The same column quotes Thornhill Liberal MPP Mario Racco as saying, in an e-mail to a Jewish constituent about Racco's position on a defeated motion against faith-based funding tabled by a fellow Liberal MPP, "I hope you are happy with the $15 million we donated for the Jewish centre in Vaughan."

The Star column continued: "The buzz at Queen's Park – vehemently denied by the government – is that this money is meant to compensate for the government's decision not to fund Jewish and other religious schools. One Liberal MPP describes the thinking behind it this way: 'Here's $15 million, so don't beat us up on the funding of faith-based schools.'"

Calls to Racco were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Federation and CJC recently launched a website, www.fundingfairness.ca, which touts their "Ontario Day School Fair Funding Initiative" and provides the community with information about their "advocacy efforts to secure fair public funding for faith-based school programs across the province."

Jonathan Schwartz, CJC's education policy advisor, in an archived article on the website, calls public funding of private schools necessary so that all children can start off on a level playing field, "regardless of what faith their school promotes."

Joseph Adler, a Toronto lawyer and parent with three children in private Jewish school, doesn't think the website or federation's stated plans go far enough or do anything to remove the optics of a conflict of interest and ensure proper advocacy.

"I spend tens of thousands of dollars on my kids' tuition. When I heard about [the grant], I was dumbstruck by the conflict of interest that it would create with UJA Federation," Adler told The CJN last week.

"They talk the talk, but they don't really push the cause. Why would they if they continue to receive funding from the government?"

Adler, who's been fighting for faith-based school funding for a decade, said he's challenged Schwartz and federation president Ted Sokolsky to answer this concern.

In an e-mail to The CJN, English stressed that "the grant and our quest for fair funding of faith-based schools are not connected. Together with our CJC partners we will continue to forcefully pursue fair funding by the provincial government of faith-based schools in the interests of financially burdened day school parents, our excellent schools and the province."

Adler is not convinced.

"They claim there's no conflict of interest but anybody can see there is," Adler said. "If I were them, I'd say [to the Liberal government] 'Thank you but no thank you. We're not interested in the funds, we want education discrimination addressed now.'"

He added: "Anybody working with our organizations across the province will know that the issue of education funding is right at the top [priority].

"We will continue to be relentless in terms of pursuing a fair solution for our kids and the right solution for education in this province."

Shulman said CJC's historical role as an advocacy organization is undiminished.

"We have absolutely established credibility as representatives of the Jewish community in terms of [advocacy]. Nothing is different here."

CJC isn't looking for public funding for private schools, rather it wants to bring private schools into the public sphere of education, he said.

"Bringing Catholic [high] schools into the public sphere [in 1984] grew the public sphere," Shulman told The CJN earlier this year. "If we want to grow public education again, a very important way to do it would be to bring the remaining variety of faith-based schools that are willing to meet appropriate accountability standards, into the public sphere."

Holocaust survivors attend first senior prom

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As teenagers in Poland in the late 1930s, Leah Frimerman, Anna Newman and Dina Shyllit were not able to finish high school and knew nothing about a senior prom.

Last week, however, along with about 140 other Holocaust survivors, they attended a belated prom at Baycrest – complete with music, dancing, brightly coloured tablecloths, prom pictures, prom cake, centrepieces and gift bags.

"As teenagers, our main concern was surviving. We didn't even think about things like proms. Now I see what we missed all those years ago," said Newman, who was 17 when the war broke out.

Lila Halpern, who was also born in Poland, said she looked forward to this prom as she would have when she was a teenager. "It's my first prom, and it is like I imagined. I'm with my friends, and it is a beautiful party."

Edmund and Adela Korngut, who met in a labour camp in Siberia, came to the prom together. "We couldn't even dream up something like this," Edmund said.

The prom was conceived by gerontology graduate Elise Kayfetz, 22, Hillel director for southwestern Ontario, with help from Marni Wolfe, 22 and Andrea Rowan, 20.

Kayfetz had previously organized a prom at Sholom Village in Hamilton, she said, and approached Paula David, who oversees the Holocaust resource programs at Baycrest.

"She thought it was a great idea, so I called the Canadian Federation of Jewish Students and asked for volunteers. Their enthusiasm was amazing. We have about 40 students and recent graduates at the prom, eating dinner, dancing and chatting with the survivors."

It was important for students to get involved, she said, because Holocaust survivors need to see that young people understand what they lived through.

David said she knew the prom was a great idea, but she had no idea how big it would get.

"It just grew and grew, and people were begging to volunteer. We actually had more volunteers than we could use, and survivors came from all across the GTA," she said.

Baycrest works with many Holocaust survivors, she added, "and I know we can't give them back what they lost, but we look for every opportunity to give them good times and new memories.

Youth give back with Tikkun Toronto

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Whether through baking, biking or playing basketball, the Tikkun Toronto event on April 29 helped teach 145 Jewish youths that giving back to the community is both rewarding and fun.

"I learned that it feels really good to volunteer, knowing that you made a bunch of people happy, including yourself," said Josh Harendorf, a 15-year-old Westmount Collegiate Institute student who participated in the day.

> 'I learned that it feels really good to volunteer'

The afternoon event that gave students in grades 5 to 12 the opportunity to volunteer in one of 12 community service activities across the Greater Toronto Area.

This was the third annual Tikkun Toronto event. It was co-ordinated by Missy Korn, program director of Toronto's B'nai Brith Youth Organization (BBYO), along with organizers from Young Judaea, Bnei Akiva and United Synagogue Youth. Funding was provided by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education

"These kids are required to have community service hours," said Korn, referring to the Ontario Ministry of Education's requirement that high school students accumulate 40 hours of volunteer time in order to graduate. "This provides them with the perfect opportunity to fulfil those and instil in them values for when they get older, values of giving back to the community."

Korn said one of the most interesting events was a basketball tournament led by Daniel Moshe Johnson, who heads the International Charity Association Network's sports and mentoring program.

In the past three months, he has set up five basketball teams for youths living in some of the city's highest crime areas. The team that played with the Jewish students was made up of teens from an underprivileged Toronto Somalian community.

"We mentor the youth on the rules of the game and how it has to be carried over into everyday life," said Johnson. "We empower young people within each basketball setting."

Johnson, a black Jew who is originally from New Orleans, got in touch with BBYO after being impressed with the work it did there after Hurricane Katrina.

"I thought it would be a good opportunity for the youth from two religious backgrounds to meet together on the same court and be able to play in peace," Johnson said.

The teens played two games, one against each other and one where the teams were mixed. No scores were kept.

"It was all about getting to know each other and having fun," said Harendorf, who played in the tournament.

"It went really well to see two different cultural and religious groups coming together as one," he said.

"I think we should be more aware of different cultural groups and religious beliefs, because we are all one, living in one community together."

Another volunteer opportunity was an aerobic workout for disabled teens from Yachad, a support group that's part of the Orthodox Union's National Jewish Council for the Disabled.

Jaime Glassman, a Grade 10 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, planned and led the workout, which was designed for about 15 disabled teens and 15 volunteers.

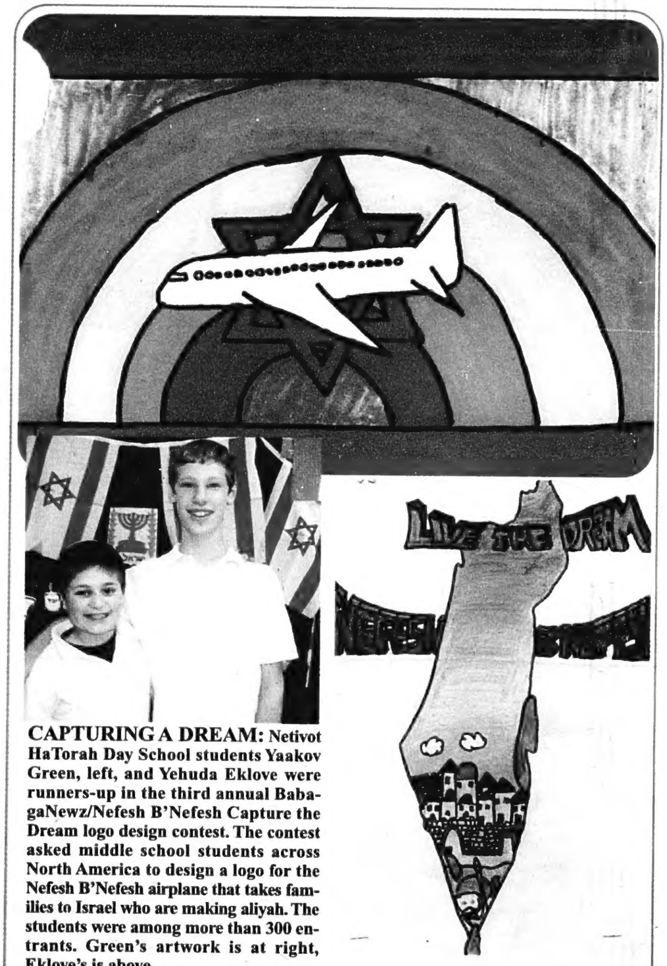
"It was a great opportunity because it allowed me to meet people of all different types," Glassman said. Her favourite part of the afternoon was not the workout, but the time spent with the Yachad teens at a park afterward.

"We hung out there and it was totally a bonding experience," she said.

This year was the first time children in grades 5 to 7 were part of Tikkun Toronto, and they participated in a bake-a-thon and painting a mural for the North York Women's Shelter.

Other activities included an environmental bike ride, in which teens collected more than 500 aluminum cans; replanting the organic garden at the Toronto Heschel School; and participating in the "Global Day for Darfur" downtown.

"I am thrilled with the turnout," Korn said. "It's important to give back, and I hope that this event instilled the value of tikkun olam within participants."



CAPTURING A DREAM: Netivot HaTorah Day School students Yaakov Green, left, and Yehuda Eklove were runners-up in the third annual BabagaNewz/Nefesh B'Nefesh Capture the Dream logo design contest. The contest asked middle school students across North America to design a logo for the Nefesh B'Nefesh airplane that takes families to Israel who are making aliyah. The students were among more than 300 entrants. Green's artwork is at right, Eklove's is above.

Winograd

By any definition of civil governance and deference to the rule of law, the events last week in Israel were remarkable. Justice Eliyahu Winograd delivered the interim report of the five-person commission he headed to the government that appointed him. The committee's assignment was to examine the decisions of the political and military leadership in prosecuting the war against Hezbollah last summer. They were also asked to consider if and how the unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon in 2000 may have influenced events last summer.

Winograd and his colleagues offered their interim conclusions in the manner that is an Israeli hallmark: with high definition clarity and unvarnished honesty. They unsparingly criticized the war's three key decision-makers, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Defence Minister Amir Peretz and then-chief of staff Dan Halutz. All were found lacking in the execution of their duties.

The prime minister's leadership was a "severe failure," they wrote. The defence minister was scolded for not having sufficient "knowledge or experience in military, political or governmental matters." And the chief of staff was upbraided for the army's general lack of preparedness for war.

The restructuring and "repair" of the army began some weeks ago long before the release of the interim report with Halutz's resignation and the appointment of Gabi Ashkenazi in his place.

The political fallout of the delivery of the interim report, however, is just now rippling through the political establishment like a strong wind through a ripe corn field. Stalks are falling in its path, but we don't yet know how the field will look at the end of the disturbance.

Olmert has refused to resign, although his foreign minister and the head of the Kadima party have called for him to do so. Peretz said he will resign his post, but only when his party votes in a leadership primary on May 28.

Large sectors of the Israeli public, in the manner that is another Israeli hallmark – forcefully and without reticence – are expressing their displeasure with the prime minister. Some 150,000 people rallied last Thursday in Tel Aviv calling on Olmert and Peretz to step down immediately.

Disappointed in Olmert's refusal to resign, dozens of students from across the political spectrum have set up a protest camp near the prime minister's residence in Jerusalem and have vowed to live there until he does leave office.

One of the organizers of the protest explained the group's motives. "We aim to instill a sense of responsibility in the common citizens. We want to make them believe in their own power. If we succeed, then we will also succeed in making it clear to future leaders that they cannot go on demonstrating disregard for their constituents."

As many commentators and observers have written, including elsewhere in this paper, the very appointment of the commission – as well as the unbowed, straightforward way in which it has conducted and continues to conduct itself, its forthright conclusions and the demanding, churning response of the Israeli people – is a heartening testament to the state's rock-solid democracy and to its reverence for the sanctity of each and every human life, which is democracy's ultimate underpinning.

This testament to democratic principles is indeed remarkable both in its own right and especially so in contrast to the principles of despotism, thuggery and rule by violence that are the norm in the region.

War criminals in Canada

How pleased I was to read the headline "Remembering is not enough, Harper says" (CJN, April 19), as he urged the world to learn from history, because the Holocaust "stands alone in the annals of human evil."

And then to my utter amazement, anger and despair (to put it mildly) to read in the same issue the headline "Canada gets an 'F' on Nazi file."

Efraim Zuroff, head of the Jerusalem office of the Simon Wiesenthal Center, is quoted as saying, "Nazi collaborators continue to evade justice in Canada thanks to systemic problems and lack of political will… Canada has not been able to deport eight Nazi collaborators who have been stripped of their citizenship." Zuroff also points out that Canada's Conservative government "inherited a bad situation and to date has not done anything to change it."

Prime Minister Stephen Harper you are right! Remembering is not enough. But neither is a photo of you placing a wreath, and words without deeds!

How much longer must Canada be put to shame and disgraced by being an "abysmal failure" and an inexcusable hypocrite by not prosecuting known World War II Nazi war criminals?

Survivors in Israel are struggling

As this year's Yom Hashoah has passed, I would like to remind us all that the struggle for Holocaust survivors continues. Here in Israel, out of close to 80,000 survivors, nearly one-third live below the Israeli poverty line. These survivors can barely afford the medications they need (while Germany provides free medications for its Holocaust survivors) and can barely live on their own without any help. Worst, the Claims Conference continues to withhold millions in payments, and several Israeli banks have not paid out the dormant accounts of Holocaust victims. It's a shame to think several European countries have done more than Israel for the care of its Holocaust survivors.

Holocaust slander

The Reform Jewish movement and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert are not the only ones to be grossly offended by a former Israeli chief rabbi's recent comments, in which he blamed the Holocaust on the Reform movement emanating from prewar Germany (Former chief rabbi accused of Holocaust slander, CJN, April 26). Several Orthodox scholars and laypeople alike were equally disturbed by Rabbi Mordechai Eliyahu's outrageous pronouncements. Rabbi Eliyahu further parenthetically stated that the lesson to be learned by the Shoah is that one should not "make even the slightest change" to Jewish practice, a comment that is itself not grounded in traditional thought and practice and is, ironically, revolutionary.

Rabbi's Eliyahu's comments regarding the Shoah suggest that he is aware of the innermost machinations of God. According to Rabbi Eliyahu, therefore, 1.5 million Jewish children, the majority of them Orthodox, for example, were murdered on account of some misguided Jews in Germany. While we are obliged to be introspective when bad things happen to us (i.e., to consider what "we" and not what "they" have done wrong), Rabbi Eliyahu's statements far exceed the realm of reasonableness and should be condemned by all. We deserve much better from our leaders.

Discrimination in day school funding

The articles "Magen David flies at Queen's Park" and "School funding motion defeated" (CJN, May 3) presented two strikingly different perspectives on the Liberal government and its current relationship with the Jewish community that are difficult to reconcile.

In the article about the inaugural Israeli flag-raising ceremony at Queen's Park in honour of the Jewish state's 59th Independence Day, it is stated that Premier Dalton McGuinty said that "whenever [the Jewish] community is attacked, it's time for all of us to stand up, join ranks and say, 'Not in my house.'"

The second article detailed how, only a few days later, the Liberals unsuccessfully tried to introduce a motion that opposed any public money for private schools.

Ontario continues to be the only province in Canada that provides full education funding for one religion (Catholics) to the exclusion of all others. The well-being and continuity of the Jewish community is threatened when our decision to send our children to Jewish day schools is not supported – both in words and in policy – by our government. It's time for McGuinty to stand up, join ranks with all of our elected representatives and say, "Discrimination in funding of faith-based schools? Not in my Ontario."

Winograd Committee's recommendations

Not just personal

By ZE'EV SEGAL

Had the Winograd Committee refrained from saying harsh things about the personal responsibility of the prime minister, defence minister and former chief of staff, its partial report would have been pushed to the margins of the headlines.

The profound and well-known flaws in Israel's decision-making processes have never interested either the public or the decision makers themselves. In fact, previous commissions of inquiry have been far more successful with respect to implementation of their personal recommendations than with respect to implementation of their systemic-institutional recommendations, of which most traces have disappeared.

The main thrust of the Winograd report is the necessity of formulating suitable ways of making decisions, at least on issues of existential importance, so that what happened last summer will not happen again – namely, so that the State of Israel will not go to war again without, as the report said, a contingency plan or even an orderly discussion that included examining existing plans and considering their advantages and disadvantages.

The Winograd report devoted considerable space to the government, which decided to go to war after a discussion that lasted for about an hour and a half – during which cabinet ministers were presented with brief and concise surveys devoid of details that might have indicated the complexity of the picture. The government, said the report, made its decision unanimously, with no abstentions, acting as a political body expressing support for the prime minister. It "did not explore and seek adequate response for various reservations that were raised" by ministers who had considerable diplomatic and security experience.

The "very serious failings" that the commission identified cry out if we recall the fact, which is perhaps not known to the ministers, that under the Basic Law on the Army, the government of Israel is the supreme commander of the Israel Defence Forces. By law, the army is subordinate to the entire government, even though the minister who is supposed to be in charge of the army on the government's behalf is the minister of defence. Thus, for example, the chief of staff is subordinate to the entire government. It is the defence minister who nominates the candidate whom he considers worthy of serving in this position, but the government is not required to accept his recommendation.

The commission's observations about the government and its responsibilities are an important element of the report, which deals at considerable length with the key and disturbing question of decision-making processes. Commission member Yehezkel Dror, an Israel Prize laureate who has devoted much of his public and professional life to this issue, made a considerable contribution to the profound analysis of this matter. For many years, Dror has elucidated the grave failures in this area to all of Israel's decision makers, but without moving them to make any significant change in their conduct.

However, it is no longer possible to ignore the commission's demand for urgent action to create the conditions that would enable meaningful discussions in the cabinet and other governmental bodies, at least on issues of war and peace without a serious response. The responsibility for promptly initiating changes in the way that decisions are made and enlisting support for their implementation rests with the prime minister.

The committee recommended establishing a procedure for presenting the government and other official bodies with background material and recommendations that would include situation assessments, aims and alternatives. It proposed "improving the knowledge base of all members of the government on core issues of Israel's challenges" by means of workshops, symposia and indepth discussions.

The cabinet will meet this week and will almost certainly resolve to adopt the report's conclusions, but it is doubtful that it will give serious thought to these recommendations. The committee itself was aware of this, noting that even recommendations that are accepted by everyone and approved by the government are usually not carried out. Therefore, it underscored the need to establish clear lines of responsibility and a clear timetable, as well as a procedure to monitor implementation in order "to change and improve matters that are essential for the security and the flourishing of state and society in Israel."

Such a decision needs to be made now, as a lesson from the past for the sake of the future – both immediate and distant.

Issues not addressed

By ZE'EV SCHIFF

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

While the Winograd Committee report is only partial, some important issues are not addressed and others are not dealt with sufficiently. The committee did a thorough job, and poked into hidden corners, but one still gets the feeling that the phrasing of the report was done under pressure. It is good the committee insisted on publishing an interim report first, and left the testimony of the prime minister, defence minister and chief of staff for the next stage. That was the logically correct order, and it is a pity the High Court was dragged into a petty dispute over this.

One issue that is conspicuously absent is the way the conflict on the Palestinian front affected the Second Lebanon War – a subject the committee did not address at all. The confrontation with the Palestinians has been going on for years, and generations of Israel Defence Forces soldiers focused on it, as if it were Israel's major struggle and all future battles would be modelled on it. This kind of thinking negatively affected the army's performance in Lebanon.

The tactical behaviour of the combat units was affected by the way battles were fought with terrorists and small guerrilla units. Everything would freeze if a spearhead encountered a terrorist. If anyone was hit, everyone waited for evacuation and new orders. It was clear, after such clashes, and certainly if the IDF suffered casualties, that the whole unit would pull back. The assumption was that the troops would return some other time. This was how several units responded in Lebanon. The IDF once excelled as a regular army. The territories ruined it.

But that is not all. From the report, it emerges that the Palestinian front imposed constraints on the IDF in its battle with Hezbollah. In view of the situation in the territories, the IDF transferred some of its finest infantry units from the north. Little by little, Israel lost its power of deterrence against Hezbollah. Even worse, Hezbollah ended up deterring Israel. A kind of mutual deterrence was created. Israel's warnings to Hezbollah remained empty threats. A laissez faire policy reigned on the northern border. Even today, there are some who say Israel should not have responded when eight soldiers were killed and two kidnapped on July 12, 2006, although it seems obvious that this abduction would have led to others, as well as deeper incursions.

Hezbollah leader Hassan Nasrallah sized up the situation correctly. He saw the two fronts against Israel – Palestinian and Lebanese – as a single unit. Evidence of this is that the first abduction at Har Dov in October 2000 took place just after the outbreak of the second intifadah. The ambush and kidnapping in July 2006 came three weeks after the kidnapping of Gilad Shalit. This important issue of how the territories and the conflict with the Palestinians affected the war should have appeared in the interim report.

The report deals superficially with Israel's power of deterrence against Hezbollah. This is a critical issue that needs to be addressed in the committee's concluding report. After all, the committee undertook to explore the processes that caused the war to develop as it did, and deterrence is one of the chief components of Israeli strategy. We are not talking about ordinary deterrence, of the kind employed vis-a-vis Arab countries or standard armies. We are talking about deterrence of a different kind, against a terrorist and guerrilla organization that has no country. True, Hezbollah built infrastructure in Lebanon, but it is ultimately at odds with the Lebanese government, and represents the interests of another country – Iran.

Therefore, the definition of victory over such an organization differs from the ordinary kind of military victory. What should be considered a victory in a military confrontation with a semi-military organization like Hezbollah? This is an issue that deserves attention in the committee's final report.

With respect to the hasty decision to go to war, the committee says the government did not conduct the kind of thorough deliberation that should have taken place beforehand. According to the report, Israel then found itself in a war that it had no intention of being in. What is not included in the report is a discussion of alternative actions that could have been taken. For example, if the military command knew that most of the field divisions were not properly trained or prepared for battle, and that emergency supplies were low, Israel could have chosen to do what it did before the Six Day War – issue an ultimatum for the return of the abducted soldiers; embark on a waiting period during which the reserves could be called up, the infantry units trained and the emergency stocks replenished; and then deliver a resounding blow.

Standing in big shoes

The aphorism "Do not judge someone until you stand in their shoes" holds many lessons. It cautions us about judgments and prejudices, but I believe it should be extended to notions of understanding and appreciation. Can we truly appreciate our parents until we are parents?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

Many people love their parents, respect them and have wonderful relationships without necessarily becoming parents themselves. Nonetheless, I think becoming one adds perspective and awareness that can lead to a different – though not necessarily better– sense of appreciation.

Try to explain to a couple or individual how their life will change when they have a child. They will understand elements of the challenge. They will grasp the idea of a major life change and can plan for certain elements such as financial security. They might be eager to join the world of families or fear the change in lifestyle, hesitating to begin. But will they understand? How can they know the radical physical and emotional changes in store for them?

Giving birth expands your sense of self, of family and of continuity. It challenges your time-management skills, as well as your psychological balance and emotional composition. Having children adds an inconceivable new dimension to love. I don't think people can even imagine the shifts that will affect their entire existence. It's a wonderful and awesome world to enter, and it can lead us to a renewed sense of our parents – of who they were and how much we owe them.

I know now that I did not fully appreciate my parents until I gave birth. These lessons rebounded over the years. Each phase added new perspectives and memories.

Often, carrying my children would remind me of my father carrying me home from shul or up to the roof on a hot summer's night. Making nightly dinners for a family of four made me cognizant of my mother's world. She worked from 9 to 5 and still prepared dinner with a protein, two vegetables and one starch. Every night, without any help.

These are perhaps trivial examples, but it's exactly in the daily and petty tasks that we need to "stand in their shoes." Those repetitive acts built our lives. Combining them with the larger frame of my parents' lives – their immigration, poverty, insufficiency of schooling, depression, war and general challenge of modernity – can only serve to illuminate, educate and expand our horizons.

So I have become aware and more appreciative as the years pass, adding awe to the love and respect. I now begin to grasp the challenges of Mom's life and the goodness she bestowed upon me. I adore Mom and cannot begin to fully show my appreciation. One day a year hardly seems sufficient.

Get issue cries out for a solution

One of the most rewarding facets of my connection to The CJN is reading the columns by Norma Joseph, a women whose erudition and sensitive approach to Orthodox Judaism I admire deeply. As readers will know, I am not Orthodox, but I consider myself bound by Halachah. Indeed I rejoice in it. I believe that a person can be shomer mitzvot as a Conservative Jew.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

I was once asked, "Are you religious or do you belong to Beth Israel [a large egalitarian Conservative congregation in Vancouver]?" That hurt!

It also hurts that the struggle for Orthodox women to be free, un-anchored women when their husbands refuse to give a get is far from over.

Joseph has been one of the most outspoken advocates for a halachic rule that will allow these agunot, women chained to hateful and vindictive husbands, to receive a get that's recognized by Orthodox rabbis. The agony of agunot is the agony of all Jewish women, whatever their denomination, and it cannot go on forever.

So it was with distress that I read this newspaper's report on the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance meeting in Jerusalem, where the issue of agunot still remained unresolved and on the agenda after 10 years of fruitless debate and protest. Other recent reports from Israel announced that new appointments to the rabbinical courts responsible for giving gets have been given to ultra-Orthodox rabbis whose resistance to women's rights is well known.

Years ago, the outstanding talmudist, Rabbi Saul Lieberman of the Conservative movement's Jewish Theological Seminary, proposed a solution to this problem, a solution that initially, it seemed, would engage Orthodox rabbis as well. Sadly, this rapprochement in regard to freeing women from recalcitrant husbands was never explored jointly by the two movements.

This is an online translation of that clause: "And the groom (name) and the bride (name) agreed that if one of them were to contemplate or seek the termination of their marriage or if one of them were to terminate it in civil court, then either may summon the other to appear before the Beit Din of the Rabbinical Assembly and of the Jewish Theological Seminary of America or its designate or successor, and that both of them will abide by the decisions of the Beit Din in order that both may be able to live according to the rule of Torah."

This clause created a way out. If the couple obtains a civil divorce, the husband by this agreement would have to give his wife a get so that she could remarry according to Jewish law.

Alas, it might have worked for Orthodox women were it not for the schism between Orthodox and Conservative. Alas, since even if this particular clause was not perfect, it may have provided a basis for a joint Orthodox-Conservative solution.

A proposal to have couples sign a prenuptial agreement that stipulates a get will be given has been suggested – but again, the agreement of the husband is a necessity. Only annulment of the marriage seems to be a way out.

I can only guess at the pain that women feel when they, or their friends, face the possibility that their lives will be altered, that they will be forbidden new relationships, new lives, perhaps even new families, when their husbands refuse to give them a get. Where are the great scholars of that movement who cling so tightly to the appellation "Torah-true Judaism" yet allow women to suffer?

("Torah-true," I fear, has become a way for Orthodox Jews to imply that any other type of Jew is inauthentic. This is an invidious distinction and insults all of us who consider ourselves observant. But I digress.)

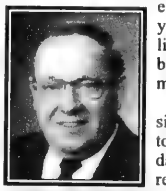
In actuality, we are living according to rabbinic Judaism. Since rabbinic Judaism has shown itself to be sensitive to real-life situations in the past, it should be able to come up with a solution to this most vital issue.

I marvel at the patience with which Orthodox women have advocated, pleaded and demanded that a solution be found, and yet no solution has been found.

To allow women to suffer in limbo, to choose between their religious convictions and a life lived outside the law (should they marry without a get and have children who will be considered mamzerim), blemishes us all. Someone must find a solution!

Anniversaries are a time to reflect

Each year there are many milestones commemorating significant events in our personal, national and international histories. On April 17, Canada marked the 25th anniversary of the coming into force of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Next year we commemorate the 60th anniversary of the United Nations Universal Declaration of Human Rights. And next year, world Jewry celebrates the 60th anniversary of the creation of the State of Israel.



Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Why is it important to highlight these important anniversaries? Although these special dates are significant, they may be regarded as simply celebratory occasions denoting the passage of time. However, they are, in reality, more than that. They are also opportunities to reflect on the significance of the original events.

The Charter of Rights introduced a new era in the Canadian experience, when basic and essential rights were elevated to a constitutionally protected status. After the horrific experience of the Holocaust, the Universal Declaration of Human Rights was an attempt to set standards and values for all persons throughout the world.

The anniversary of the creation of Israel reminds us of the importance of an historically recognized homeland and statehood for a people, oppressed throughout history. With valour and determination, these pioneers found a means to flourish in a process of self-realization. We recall and appreciate this long and difficult process, now etched in our memories as we celebrate each Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Not all anniversaries are happy occasions. We mark the occasion of a loved one's death each year with the lighting of a yahrzeit candle. We reflect on the life and times of those we remember, celebrating their lives and mourning their loss.

Above all, these special occasions allow us and even compel us to depart from our ordinary, everyday lives. They provide us with a reason and an opportunity to take stock of our own lives as well as the lives of those who have toiled or have sacrificed in order to provide us with a better world. These events are times to measure today against the past and to assess whether we and our predecessors have been successful in creating a peaceful, more humane world for us and for our future generations.

Consider, for example, the 60th anniversary of the UN Universal Declaration of Human Rights. When it was enacted as a resolution of the UN General Assembly in 1948, following the Holocaust, the world vowed to ensure that man's mistreatment of his fellow man cease and that the world take a new, enlightened and progressive step forward in an era of peace and human dignity. The object was to ensure that the world would be free from the oppressive nature of those malevolents who pushed Europe to the depths of human experience in the preceding years.

Since then, however, the world has experienced regional and civil wars too many to recount. These conflicts have included examples of systemic genocide in the Balkans, in Africa and several other places throughout the planet. The past 60 years have taught us that, like any instrument, the UN Declaration is just a document, a document that may not have permeated the minds and consciousness of world leaders and policy makers. It also evident that the United Nations is a far different organization today than that which existed in 1948. It is certainly no panacea for world peace and harmony. Although we have inherited a world full of strife and disharmony, we should also speculate as to what the world would be like without a universal declaration of human rights.

Anniversaries do not simply remind us of past achievements and tragedies, but also represent a time for renewal, a time to review our progress since the last particular milestone. This reflection may spur us on to take steps to strive for the betterment of our lives, our communities and our world.

On an individual level, isn't this what birthdays and wedding anniversaries are about – renewal and betterment? So as we celebrate the 25th anniversary of the Charter or the 60th anniversary of the Universal Declaration or the 60th anniversary of the founding of the State of Israel or any anniversary for that matter, let us recall the lessons of the past and pledge a commitment to seek a better future. Then these special dates will have greater significance and promise for all.

Winograd Commission exposed deep failures

Sheldon Kirshner
In Toronto

Long before the Winograd Commission released its scathing interim report on April 30 on Israel's conduct of the 34-day war in Lebanon last summer, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert was in deep trouble.

Although most Israelis supported his momentous decision to attack Hezbollah in response to a brazen ambush that resulted in the deaths of three Israeli soldiers and the kidnapping of two others, they soon grew disillusioned with his handling of the war and its inconclusive outcome.

Last September, fending off pressure to appoint an official committee of inquiry, Olmert appointed a government commission, led by retired Supreme Court judge Eliyahu Winograd, to investigate the war. Within days, Olmert admitted that there had been failures in the management of the war, but claimed that Hezbollah no longer posed a military threat.

Shortly afterward, a retired Israeli general, Doron Almog, released a report blaming all levels of the army's command for failures in waging the war and for not learning lessons from Hezbollah's abduction of three Israeli soldiers on the Lebanese border in October 2000, nearly five months after Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon.

Last January, hot on the heels of the resignation of Gen. Dan Halutz – the chief of staff who orchestrated the air and land campaign in Lebanon – a wide range of Israeli politicians declared that Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz had lost the confidence of the people and should step aside.

Less than a month later, Olmert, appearing before the Winograd Commission, defended his role, saying that Israel had, in fact, won the war. Listing Israel's achievements, Olmert said that Hezbollah had been driven from positions on the northern border, that its long-range missiles had been destroyed, that the Lebanese army had finally been deployed in southern Lebanon, and that the existing United Nations peacekeeping force, UNIFIL, had been bulked up.

He also disclosed that the war was basically planned in March 2006, when he, on Halutz's advice, decided that Israel would respond forcefully to further kidnappings of Israeli soldiers by Hezbollah. Halutz apparently told Olmert that Israel could not afford to maintain its policy of restraint, lest its deterrent capability be eroded.

During his testimony, Olmert said that he accepted Halutz's reasoning, and that Israel's overarching goal in a war would be the implementation of a United Nations Security Council resolution that called for the stationing of the Lebanese army along the border and the disarmament of Hezbollah.

Olmert's rationale for waging the war was persuasive, given Hezbollah's aggression since Israel's unilateral pullout from Lebanon. As a pretext for shelling Israeli army posts and civilian settlements, Hezbollah insisted that the Shebaa Farms enclave, occupied by Israel since the 1967 Six Day War, was Lebanese rather than Syrian territory, a claim that flew in the face of a UN ruling.

But once the war erupted, exposing Israel's inability to incapacitate Hezbollah or stop the daily barrage of missiles and mortars into the Galilee, the Israeli public gradually withdrew its support. No less a person than Shimon Peres, the deputy prime minister, told the Winograd Commission that, if it had been up to him, he would not have gone to war. Ehud Barak, the Israeli premier who ordered the unilateral withdrawal after the breakdown of peace talks with Syria, was more blunt, pronouncing the war as an outright failure.

Eliyahu Winograd

The Winograd Commission, whose first of two reports covers the period from July 12 to 17, leans toward Barak's interpretation. Its conclusions are pretty devastating. Military operations were not based on "a detailed, comprehensive and authorized" plan. The government did not consider "the whole range of options," including the containment of Hezbollah. It exhibited "weakness in strategic thinking." Cabinet ministers neither understood the implications of a war nor had an exit strategy. The declared objectives of the war were not clear, nor could they be achieved. The Israel Defence Forces did not show "creativity" in proposing alternatives.

These abject failures were foreshadowed by Israeli newspaper accounts in the months leading up to the release of the interim report. In a nutshell, they suggested that the general staff was stifled by Halutz's certitude. Halutz, until the very end, strongly opposed a broad ground operation and forbade his deputies to express views not in accord with his own. In addition, top generals knew in advance that a war could not free the two kidnapped reservists, Ehud Goldwasser and Eldad Regev.

Given its damning verdict, the Winograd Commission had no choice but to condemn Olmert, saying that he acted in haste and did not systematically engage in consultations, thereby failing to exercise judgment, responsibility and prudence.

Yet Olmert was not the only figure to be chastized. Peretz came in for hard knocks, too. He was accused of a lack of knowledge and experience in "military, political or governmental matters" and of a failure to examine "the preparedness and fitness of the IDF" and to develop "an independent assessment" of the complexity of a war in Lebanon. In short, the commissioners noted, Peretz "impaired Israel's ability to respond well to its challenges."

As for Halutz, he reacted "impulsively" to the abductions and did not inform "the political echelon" that the IDF was not ready to undertake an extensive ground offensive.

Not surprisingly, the Winograd Commission was critical as well of the "military commanders and political leaders" who were responsible for Israel's security after its unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon. By inference, then, Barak, Ariel Sharon (the former prime minister) and Shaul Mofaz (the ex-minister of defence and chief of staff and the current transportation minister), among others, came in in for a bashing.

The withering critique of Olmert's performance has emboldened some important figures to stage what amounts to a mutiny.

In a press conference, Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni, who covets his job, called for his immediate resignation. Avigdor Yitzhaki, the head of the Kadima faction, and Marina Solodkin, a Kadima member of Knesset, also pressed for his removal. Eitan Cabel, the secretary general of the Labor party and a minister in Olmert's coalition government, declared that Israelis have lost faith in his leadership, and that he should go.

Olmert, a slippery, tough-as-nails political operator, has pushed back, saying he will not resign and will appoint a team to study the report and carry out its recommendations.

His decision to tough it out, at least until the Winograd Commission's next report in the summer, is probably based on three calculations. He assumes that some of the tension will be defused when Peretz, as widely reported, resigns and his position is filled by Barak after the Labor party primary on May 28. He is counting on the perception that his possible successor, Likud party leader Benjamin Netanyahu, is simply too unpalatable to many Israelis. He hopes that a breakthrough in talks with the Palestinians may produce a dividend in terms of his popularity, which has sunk to a new nadir of two to three per cent.

But Olmert may be deluding himself.

At best, Olmert's future hangs in the balance.

Paul Penna to honour noted genetics researcher

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Last week on April 30 – one day before his 87th birthday – genetics researcher Lou Siminovitch set off for a week in London and Berlin with two of his five grandchildren, who are university students.

In an interview in his office at Mount Sinai Hospital's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute prior to the trip, he was looking forward to their theatre, concert and art gallery outings as well as his plans to "see a couple of scientists… Nobel prize winners I want them to meet."

The trip exemplifies his deep connection to arts, science and family, as well as the reason he will be honoured at a May 14 gala by the Paul Penna Downtown Jewish Day School.

Siminovitch reflects many of the values of the school, said gala co-chair Aviva Rajsky, referring to the importance of family, community, the "marriage of science and the arts," and a passion for excellence and critical thinking.

The event will take place at the Miles Nadal JCC's Al Green Theatre and will be hosted by television personality Ralph Benmergui. It will feature actor and singer Colm Wilkinson, musicians David Buchbinder and Hilario Duran, actor Dan Chameroy of the Stratford Festival's Oklahoma!, jazz vocalist Sophie Milman, the Tokai String Quartet, actor/comedian Rick Miller, Pro Arte Danza's Roberto Campanella and Robert Glumbek, and actor/Yiddish singer Theresa Tova.

Siminovitch, who was born in Montreal to immigrant parents, has been the recipient of a slew of science honours. He is also a companion of the Order of Canada, and his name is attached to the Elinore & Lou Siminovitch Prize in Theatre, established to honour him and his late wife, a playwright.

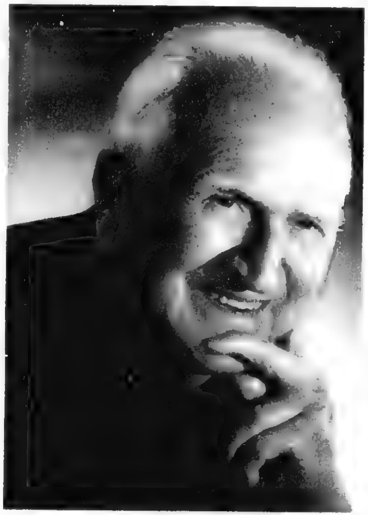
He received his PhD in chemistry from McGill University in 1944 and spent six years in Paris working as a genetics research fellow at the Institut Pasteur.

The founding chair of the University of Toronto's department of medical genetics, Siminovitch also served as geneticist-in-chief at the Hospital for Sick Children. He was co-founder and editor of several professional journals and has been in Toronto for more than 50 years.

Siminovitch says it never crossed his mind to retire, although he noted that he's "30 years older than anybody else" at scientific meetings he attends. "I love what I do," he said, adding that both his science career and serving as a mentor to students and younger researchers have given him a great deal of satisfaction.

Now "semi-retired," he puts in a five-day week that runs from 9:30 to 4 o'clock, sharing office space with his daughter Dr. Katherine Siminovitch, a senior scientist at the Lunenfeld institute.

Much of his work time is spent in an advisory capacity. In addition, Siminovitch has been involved with Baycrest and the Canadian Society for the Weizmann Institute of Science, now known as Weizmann Science Canada. He served on the board of both organizations and interviews high school students who apply for Weizmann's Dr. Bessie F. Lawrence International Summer Science Institute.



Lou Siminovitch

At the height of his career, Siminovitch worked 80-hour weeks, but said he had to be home for dinner with his wife and three daughters every night. Although it took a few years, he came to realize it was "the greatest thing that happened to me."

Conversation revolved around books and literature, because, he said, "at our dinner table, we were not allowed to talk science."

A grandfather of two children at the Penna school, Siminovitch is not a proponent of Jewish education per se, but he said he likes "what they're doing in the school," which was founded in 1998 and runs from senior kindergarten to Grade 8. What appeals to him is "the nature of the school" and the fact that it is downtown, he said.

He said that he and his wife were atheists, but he understands "the importance of being Jewish."

The money raised at the annual event, now in its fourth year, goes to the school's subsidy program and allows it "never to turn away a family," said Rajsky's co-chair Jodi Tanenbaum. The gala raises most of the $150,000 that the school uses for annual subsidies, she added.

Tickets for the gala are $250 and can be purchased by contacting the school at 416-928-3537 or info@djds.ca.

She'arim prepares to leave BJCC

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School is looking for a new home – and for funding to facilitate the move.

The school, which serves students from Grade 1 through Grade 8 with learning disabilities, attention deficit hyperactivity disorder and mild forms of autism, will have to leave its current 8,000-square-foot rented premises at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre by summer 2008, said Faigie Davids, She'arim's executive director.

The BJCC will be torn down and replaced by a new facility as part of the "Tomorrow" project launched by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto in 2000.

She'arim, which moved to the BJCC in 2001 from Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, currently has 92 students in 11 classes. There is a maximum of nine students per class.

"We'd like to see ourselves grow a little bit, but in a school such as ours, one doesn't want to see it growing too large, because we want to maintain that personal, individual support for each child," said principal Kathy Manoim.

Davids and Manoim said a central location along the Bathurst corridor would be preferred, because that would afford older students easy access by public transit, and also because students live in a geographic area that extends north to Richmond Hill and south of Eglinton Avenue. Parking and outdoor play space are also considerations, they added.

"We need more office space," Davids said. Support staff, including a speech pathologist and music therapist, do not have enough designated space, she explained. "And there is no space if a child is withdrawn to get remedial [help] or enrichment," she said. "A lot of this happens in the hallways, which is not ideal."

"We really work with the child as a whole," said Manoim. "Academic skills are one area of importance, but [just] as significant are organizational, behavioural and social skills, and emotional well-being."

Students generally stay at the school for a minimum of two years, and most of the graduates continue their education at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Manoim said.

Many have pursued post-secondary education, and some have gone on to post-graduate education, she added. "I think our focus is really on producing young adults who are able to advocate for themselves and able to find their niche in life at whatever level of capacity they can achieve."

The school's annual fundraising efforts will be ramped up in the coming year to cover not just operating costs but the cost of the move. Although the school hasn't ruled out renting new premises, Davids estimates it will have to raise at least $2 million to $3 million if it decides to buy a new building. Ongoing fundraising includes a retail gift card program and an annual golf tournament.

Phase 1 of the fundraising will be a June 6 dinner at Adath Israel Congregation honouring Jewish war veterans, including veterans of Israeli wars, "and linking them with those we consider our current heroes, our children, who [have] a huge burden to overcome," Davids said.

The dinner will feature keynote speaker retired Canadian Maj.-Gen. Lewis Mackenzie, as well as former federal cabinet minister Barney Danson and Dr. Charles Solnik, who was a field surgeon in Israel.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Learning from the shmittah year

By RABBI YOSSI MICHALOWICZ

Rabbinic Reflections

Imagine if a very rich and influential friend approached you with the following offer: "Friend, I know you have been working very hard for the last six years. Tell you what – take a sabbatical next year and just relax!"

You would respond, "That's a great idea, but how will I live for a whole year without making any money? In addition, what guarantee will I have that I will get my job back after the year is over?"

To this, the wealthy friend responds, "I have already spoken to your boss and he has signed a legal document guaranteeing your job a year from now, and here is a cheque from me – a full year's salary – that you can cash today!"

Would you take your friend up on the offer? One would think that most people certainly would.

Well, this offer is not unique. We see in this week's Torah portion of Behar that God made this very offer to the Jewish people with the mitzvah of shmittah.

The Torah requires all Jewish residents in the Land of Israel to let their farms lay fallow for an entire year every seventh year. No plowing, planting, harvesting, etc. – in short, a full year of rest for you and the land. And about those concerns of yours, God promises the following: No problem! "I will ordain my blessing for you in the sixth year, and it will yield a crop for the three years." The people would get a triple crop in the sixth year.

We would expect the Jews to be jumping at such an offer. After all, you can't find a better guarantor than the Almighty himself! So what happened?

The answer is revealed in the second parshah, Bechukotai, when Moshe tells the Jewish people about the future calamities that will befall them for not following in the ways of the Torah. During this description, we are told, "Then the land will appease its shmittah years during all the years of its desolation, while you are in the land of your foes; then the land will rest and it will make its shmittah years appeasing. All the days of its being desolate it will rest, whatever it did not rest during your shmittah years when you dwelled upon her."

The commentaries explain that the Jews suffered 70 years of exile after the destruction of the First Temple. This was a measure-for-measure punishment for the 70 shmittah cycles that they did not keep while they lived in the Land of Israel.

We see from this that, by and large, many Jews did not want to take God up on His generous offer to have a full year paid leave of absence even with a promise of a triple crop in advance. How do we explain this?

Every person has a basic need for self-actualization. We all need to feel that we accomplish things in life. One of the deepest needs a person has is to feel that he exists from what he produces, either in terms of income or other means to sustain himself. People have a deep need to feel that what they create enables them to survive. This can be experienced by being a successful businessman, professional or farmer.

This need is a healthy one, as long as it helps us develop and maintain our relationship with the Master of the Universe. God wants us to feel good about ourselves, but we must never forget that this blessed state of providing for oneself is also one of the gifts from God. The mitzvah of shmittah reminds us of this when every seven years we stop working and let God provide for us exclusively. Ideally, we retain this lesson the other six years, and thus always appreciate His gifts. This cycle of seven thus has strong parallels to the weekly work cycle, which is broken by the observance of Shabbat, the day of rest.

Indeed, this is a great challenge for man: realize that all your success is only a gift from God for us to appreciate. Mankind struggles with this, and from this week's portions, we see that many Jews would rather work during the seventh year and delude themselves into thinking that they are the source of their own existence. A painful exile from the land, followed by a providential return, was needed to teach man the valuable lesson he could have otherwise learned through the joyous performance of this mitzvah.

Enduring lessons from a radical sabbatical

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

This month marks three years since we returned from our "radical" sabbatical: travelling together as a family for six months through eight countries – Hawaii, New Zealand, Australia, China, Thailand, Israel, Greece and Italy. We still talk about this bonding and learning experience as if it happened yesterday. People still ask us what we learned. Here's what we remember most.

- Let go: Buses were late, plane schedules were changed, museums were closed. "Deal with it" became our mantra. We learned how petty our lives get when we concentrate on the petty.
- Don't cling to things. When you're travelling through eight countries with three kids. you can't shlepp a lot of luggage. We learned how little we really need, as opposed to how much we really want. We noted this especially where the urge to buy everything because it was cheap was overwhelming. We learned that the more we own, the more it owns us.
- Children can rise to any occasion when their families have faith in them. My generation of parents tend to coddle children, do for them, and shelter them. Our kids were faced with long train rides with no Game Boys. They used their imaginations, looked out the window, read books. Once, they explained Judaism for seven hours – from Abraham to Theodor Herzl – to our Buddhist guide. Of course, they fought with each other and got bored, tired and cranky, but they knew that we believed if they could handle new foods, new experiences and new challenges, then they would.
- The only thing we really have is time. For the first time in our lives, all we had was time. In the beginning, it was extraordinarily hard to stop the wheels from turning, both in my head and physically, and nearly impossible to rest and relax. I felt a tremendous need to plan and organize. What would we do if we weren't doing something? But some of our finest moments came unplanned.
- Let your Judaism expand your horizons. We didn't expect synagogue to be the same as at home. On Maui, we davened with an Orthodox rabbi who chooses the denominational liturgy of the week's service based on a majority vote from the mostly tourist congregation. In Australia, the Reform rabbi asks anyone who is from out of town to stand up and introduce themselves, then they introduce this week's "host" family, who gladly take in guests for Shabbat dinner. In China, we davened with a Reconstructionist chavurah in Beijing one week and Chabad in Shanghai the next. In Athens, we encountered Greek tunes and a Greek prayerbook that has its own order unlike anything we were familiar with – and we got to throw up our hands and say, "It's Greek to me!" In Kaifeng, China, Moshe, "official Chinese Jew" for the tourists, greeted us in a kippah with "Shalom aleichem." I half expected him to say, "Funny, you don't look Jewish."
- Know how blessed you are in "the real world." As we saw the tremendous homelessness all over the world, in every city, we appreciated once more the blessings we have. Our travel bug never abated, and our love for home doubled. But we will never be happy with Disneyland now that we've seen the real world, and we highly recommend it.

Ethical pitfalls in corporate structures

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

For years, the mark of success for a business was when it reached the point of "going public." Today, we're seeing a reverse trend, with a spate of firms being bought for the express purpose of taking public firms private. The latest and biggest case in Canadian history – potentially valued at more than $30 billion – is the ongoing negotiations to privatize BCE Inc.

While the choice of whether to remain public or become a private firm is ethically neutral, the corporate structure contains many potential ethical pitfalls. Corporations are no more than legal fictions, impersonal and devoid of feeling. As such, we often feel no compunction in taking liberties with a corporation that we wouldn't take when dealing with individuals.

This thinking reflects itself in the often obscene (there are few other words for it) salaries that executives often make – after all, it's just corporate money. It can also be seen in the attitude toward expenses, perks and risk-taking. There aren't too many private firms that would engage in the type of risk-taking that had the Bank of Montreal announce trading losses of up to $450 million in the second quarter. Even when big gambles are taken, there is usually much more oversight and risk awareness. But since such losses affect some impersonal, unknown shareholder, we often let our ethical guard down.

This same thinking is often displayed toward the largest and most impersonal corporation of them all – the government. I write these words on April 30 as millions of Canadians are getting around to filing their income tax returns. Everyone acknowledges that cheating on taxes is widespread. If everyone paid what they should, it's likely that billions of dollars would become available for spending initiatives, with billions left over for tax reductions and debt repayment.

A government spokesperson was quoted as saying that the problem is so large it can't even be quantified. Yet, close to 100 per cent of people who cheat on their taxes would not even think of stealing something as small as a chocolate bar from a candy store.

When we attach a face to a victim, we feel a sense of compassion and remorse, enabling us to act honestly. But Jewish law sees such sins as cheating on taxes as much greater wrongs. One can always repay an individual and show sincere remorse to their victim. Neither is possible with theft from the public purse, and ironically, rare is the perpetrator who thinks of "repenting" after such a terrible sin. While being held up at gunpoint is much more frightening, from an ethical perspective, white collar crime is no less a sin. In fact, the white collar criminal must pay back twice what was stolen, whereas the blue collar criminal is obligated to pay back the amount stolen and no more.

A further, related problem is the pass-the-buck syndrome that is all too common in corporations. Ultimately, impersonal shareholders own these businesses and hence should be held accountable for their corporate policies, or lack thereof. However, the day-to-day running of public corporations is done by hired mangers who generally act independently, and often with little direct shareholder involvement. Not only can each blame the other for the lack of ethical clarity – as they are wont to do, especially in court – their interests often conflict. Such can be the case with a buyout, when a CEO may be in line for a huge payout, one that may come at the expense of shareholders.

The Six Day War, Part 1

The Jewish Highway

It's very hard, four decades later, to imagine the fear and then, the euphoria that spread through Israel and the Jewish world as the Middle East was plunged into war in 1967. It's hard… but with the help of the Internet, you can get a taste of the war whose effects are still being felt after 40 years. As we approach Yom Yerushalayim and the 40th anniversary of the Six Day War, you can relive coverage of that war.

Although the war was covered in depth by world media, most of the sources in this column refer to Time magazine and to a lesser extent, the BBC. That's because Time is one of the few major publications that has made its entire archive accessible online – free of charge. I assume that coverage in the weekly newsmagazine was fairly typical of how much of the western media covered the war.

At the heart of its coverage, Time's June 9, 1967, issue features Israeli Prime Minister Levi Eshkol on its cover [http://tinyurl.com/2xvwkn] and looks at Israel: The Struggle to Survive. "Last week, 19 years after the Diaspora dream of return to Zion became a reality in the first Jewish state in almost 2,000 years, Levi Eshkol and his people found themselves besieged and threatened as few nations have ever been in their history…" [http://tinyurl.com/239j65]

The following week, the magazine devoted another 5,000 words to How Israel Won the War. There's much written about the "new Defence Minister Moshe Dayan, the dashing, one-eyed 'Hero of Sinai,'" (also featured on that week's cover [http://tinyurl.com/2h3g6x]). Other personalities featured prominently in the coverage include Egypt President Gamal Abdel Nasser and Jordan's King Hussein. [http://tinyurl.com/25wvx6]

That same issue contains a much shorter but in some ways, a much more telling article. Given the pain and loss of life suffered over the years since then, it's eye-opening to read an article that retold "chutzpah-laced jokes about the Middle East conflict." Titled "Blintzkrieg," it epitomizes the headiness felt by Israelis and supporters around the world right after the war. A selection:

- Reports from the second day of fighting indicated that the Egyptians had destroyed four Jeeps, a kosher mobile kitchen and 14 air-conditioned Cadillacs. The Israelis claimed 400 MIGs and 24 flying carpets.
- "It's unfair," said a UAR [Egyptian] spokesperson. "They have 2,300,000 Jews on their side. And we have none."
- At one point in the campaign, an Arab division spotted a lone Israeli sniper on a sand dune. The commander dispatched three men to get him. When they did not return, he sent a dozen. None of them came back. So he finally sent an entire company. Two hours later, one blood-splattered Egyptian soldier crawled back. "It was an ambush," he explained. "There were two of them." [http://tinyurl.com/28cboj]

If you want a break from all the articles, go to the BBC site and watch a few reports from the war. On June 6, correspondent John Bierman was stationed with Israeli troops at Khan Younis on the Gaza Strip. "It would appear from a military briefing that we've just been given that the Israeli plan in this part of the front at any rate is to cut off the Gaza Strip from the rest of Egypt. The Gaza Strip… has been described by Israeli strategists as a pistol pointing straight at the heart of Tel Aviv." [http://tinyurl. com/yrn93d] Don't miss the timeline at the centre of the page that links to more BBC audio and video clips from this and other Mideast wars. Over at YouTube, a vintage newsreel complete with dramatic narration and over-the-top background music. [http://tinyurl.com/2bf9mh]

As you listen to the report and pore over the articles, it's hard to believe some of them were written 40 years ago. Two weeks after the war. Time wrote, "In a rational world, Israel's terms would not seem overly harsh. What it asks in exchange for the land it has conquered is not a return to its dangerous existence before the war but a guarantee that it can live in peace. 'Our watchword is not backward to belligerency, but forward to peace,' explained its ever-eloquent Foreign Minister Abba Eban." [http://tinyurl.com/ywy5ar]

Next time, the war and its legacy.

Hatzolah marks 10 years with first fundraiser

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Hatzoloh, a non-profit volunteer organization that offers onsite emergency medical care before the arrival of professional medical intervention by ambulance, is holding its first major fundraising event.

On Monday, May 14, Hatzoloh Toronto, which is part of an international organization, will hold An Evening of Appreciation, honouring its 30 trained Hatzoloh responders and 15 dispatchers, at the Paramount, 222 Rowntree Dairy Rd., in Vaughn.

The guest speaker will be Public Safety Minister Stockwell Day.

Chief Bruce Farr of Toronto EMS will be honoured in recognition of the help and cooperation Toronto EMS has provided to Hatzoloh.

The evening will be dedicated to the memory of Shmulik Reichmann, an active Hatzoloh responder and founding member who died two years ago.

Hatzoloh (Hebrew for rescue) was formed in the Orthodox community 10 years ago with 10 volunteers to respond rapidly to emergency medical needs of anyone in the Jewish community.

"When I joined the board six years ago, we were getting one or two calls a week," says Hatzoloh president Moshe Sigler. "We now get two or three emergency calls a day."

Sigler said that Hatzoloh volunteers, who are on call 24/7, are located throughout the community.

"They provide quick, high quality, non-transport care within minutes of being dispatched. Hatzoloh also ensures that 911 is called," he said.

"Volunteers wait with patients until an ambulance arrives and patients are safely transferred into the care of the ambulance personnel."

He said the community owes an immeasurable debt of gratitude to the devoted Hatzoloh volunteers.

"They give tirelessly, both in the forefront and behind the scenes, giving so generously of their time, effort and family life in their lifesaving roles."

Under the auspices of Sunnybrook & Women's College Health Centre's division of pre-hospital care, responders receive the designation of emergency medical responder, with an EMR/D certification, after completing 250 hours of intensive training.

As well, responders are trained to cater to the unique religious needs of the Jewish community regarding emergency medical care.

"The responders have gone beyond their mandate," Sigler said. "As an example, a child had a serious burn. The parents had to accompany the child to the hospital in an ambulance. Our Hatzoloh volunteer remained with the other children at their home until other family members arrived."

Dr. Debra Kiez, Hatzoloh's medical director, is an emergency room physician at York Central Hospital and in private family practice.

Ten years ago, Hatzoloh's area of service was from Eglinton to Sheppard avenues., and from Allen Road to Avenue Road. Today, the boundaries have expanded up to Highway 7 following the Bathurst Street corridor.

For more information on Hatzoloh or to make reservations for the fundraising dinner, call 416-398-2300, or visit hatzolohtoronto.org.

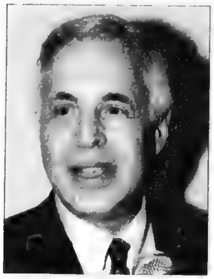
Focus on shared values, rabbi tells interfaith dinner

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

A retired U.S. Navy chaplain says his experience as a rabbi in the armed forces taught him that focusing on common social issues is the best way to improve relations between Christians and Jews.



Rabbi Arnold Resnicoff

"The secret of the chaplain corps was not talking about theology first, not talking about the hardest issues first. Instead, we rolled up our sleeves and talked about shared concerns [first] – [soldiers] in pain, those in fear, those suffering from doubt or loneliness," Rabbi Arnold Resnicoff told the the 21st annual Neighbourhood Interfaith Dinner, held recently at Yorkminster Park Baptist Church.

"Only after we had built relationships [with each other] did we talk about faith issues. Otherwise, we agreed to disagree on theology and agreed to agree on the needs of humanity."

Rabbi Resnicoff, now a Washington, D.C., consultant on interreligious affairs and a former special assistant on values and vision to the secretary and chief of staff of the U.S. Air Force, was the keynote speaker at the dinner, which was attended by some 300 clergy and congregants from seven churches and three synagogues in mid-town Toronto.

Participating congregations included Beth Tzedec Congregation, Beth Sholom Synagogue, Temple Sinai, Christ Church Deer Park, the Church of St. Clement, Grace Church on-the-Hill, Holy Rosary Church, St. Ansgar Lutheran Church and Timothy Eaton Memorial Church.

Rabbi Resnicoff said it's possible to be moved by the faith and teachings of others, noting that he was inspired to become a rabbi by a Christian chaplain who served with him in the Vietnam War.

He also recalled that during times of personal turmoil, when he was stationed overseas, he turned to the Christian chaplains for spiritual and emotional support.

"When I had hard times in my life following the death of my brother and the death of my father, I was the only rabbi around. The priests and ministers with whom I worked became my rabbis."

Rabbi Resnicoff said that Christianity and Judaism have distinctly different theologies, and many miscommunications occur because people think they understand the other faith when in fact they may not.

"It is better to assume we do not [understand the other faith] and to treat Judaism or Christianity as a new, unknown religion and listen to believers in those faiths explain their faith to us."

Learning about others' faith through dialogue is a way to prevent conflict and avoid misunderstandings, he said. "We need to talk, to share with each other what words hurt ."

He said Jews and Christians have "conflicting visions of the end of days," and so he stressed the importance of working together on issues in the here and now, such as poverty and homelessness.

"The more we focus on getting through today – making this a better day – the more we can agree. Therefore, focus on poverty, crime, injustice and discrimination. Work on projects like Habitat for Humanity, which help the homeless."

Rabbi Resnicoff outlined three pitfalls to avoid in interfaith dialogue, which he calls the "rules of engagement."

Firstly, he said comparisons between religious groups can't be a comparison between "our best and their worst." Secondly, one can never compare "our teachings to their actions." Thirdly, in a comparison of teachings, don't compare "our beliefs to their words" because beliefs are learned in context while words can be taken out of context from others' holy books.

Archives runs workshop on keeping records, photos

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

The care and preservation of old photographs, documents and other sensitive heirlooms is the theme of a two-hour workshop offered by the Ontario Jewish Archives on Sunday, May 20, from 1 to 3 p.m., at the Lipa Green Building.

"A lot of people have come in and asked how to deal with sensitive and damaged records and photos that are dear to them but they don't know how to preserve them," said archivist Ellen Scheinberg, one of two authorities who will be on hand at the workshop. "Rather than going into Blacks or Grand & Toy, they want an archival solution to preserve their family treasures."

The other authority at the Preserving Your Family Treasures Workshop will be Lincoln Ross, a photo conservator who has done a lot of work for the City of Toronto Archives.

"I'll be talking about photographs and the best way to preserve them," he said.

Old items in need of conservation may include a grandmother's letters from World War II, great-grandmother's diary from Europe, a graduation certificate or photographs that may have faded or crumbled over time.

Many people store family photographs in albums that could damage them in the long run, Scheinberg said.

"My pet peeve is those awful photo albums from the '70s and '80s with the adhesive pages. Over time, the glue starts sticking to the photos and the clear plastic, and it becomes hard to remove the photos without ripping them."

The first part of the workshop will feature a presentation. In the second part, Scheinberg and Ross will advise participants about conserving particular photos or documents.

Anyone with old photographs or documents can learn some useful preservation techniques at the workshop, Scheinberg said.

The fee is $25 and pre-registration is required. For details, please call 416-635-2883, ext. 170.

A step forward for Lebovic Campus

New road in Vaughan memorializes Israeli hero

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY
UJA FEDERATION

Another milestone in the development of the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus took place on Sunday with the official naming of Ilan Ramon Boulevard, adjacent to the campus. The Lebovic Campus, on Bathurst north of Rutherford in the City of Vaughan, is one of three campuses for Jewish life in the Greater Toronto Area, under the umbrella of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign. The street naming was followed by a Lag B'omer street festival featuring activities for the whole family.

Ilan Ramon, the first Israeli astronaut on a U.S. space mission, who perished aboard the space shuttle Columbia with six other astronauts on February 1, 2003, was celebrated as a modern-day hero at the event.

Vaughan Mayor Linda Jackson who is enthusiastic about the Lebovic Community Campus

"Occasionally, individuals will accomplish something special and become role models in their communities," said Vaughan mayor Linda Jackson. "Ilan Ramon was such a person in Israel, but his accomplishments transcended international boundaries. All of us in Vaughan are proud to honour his memory."

Mayor Jackson also praised the Lebovic Campus as a service complex for all York Region residents.

"This project is truly a monumental achievement," said Jackson. "What makes it special is that it is not exclusively for the use of the 60,000 people of the Jewish faith living north of Steeles Avenue. This project is for the entire community and we all benefit."

The Lebovic Campus is a 50-acre site – the first in Vaughan of this magnitude – built by an ethno-cultural community. When completed, the campus will house the northern branch of Tanenbaum CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto), other Jewish schools, a Mount Sinai Hospital Wellness Clinic, the Schwartz /Reisman Centre and several community agencies. Tanenbaum CHAT, the first facility to be built, will open this September.

"The Lebovic Campus and the Tomorrow Campaign represent a shared vision for the Jewish community and the GTA that we are proud to implement," said Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. "It's our contribution to enhancing a remarkable city and the future of Jewish life in the GTA."

The Tomorrow Campaign includes the downtown campus, consisting of the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre and the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life; Central Square at Bathurst and Sheppard; and the Lebovic Campus.

Architects transform Tomorrow Campaign campuses

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

At the centre of any urban transformation is exciting architecture, and UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign is no exception.

Spanning the Greater Toronto Area from Bloor and Spadina in the south to Bathurst and Ilan Ramon Boulevard in the north, the ambitious development of three campuses for Jewish life in Toronto is defining the future of the community through its spaces.

The Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life, which makes up the downtown campus along with the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre, was designed with the objective of "serving as a landmark and a source of Jewish pride on the University of Toronto campus," explains Susan Friedrich, who served as architect for the building.

Infused with Jewish imagery, the facility includes a wall constructed from Jerusalem stone, a series of sandblasted windows depicting the story of the Jewish people, and a wooden pergola plus a canopy that suggest the wooden roofs of traditional synagogues. In addition, an olive tree and maple tree that sit on the southeast corner of the site represent the union of Jewish and Canadian life.

Central Square, located on Bathurst Street north of Sheppard, will be a "campus of interconnected buildings," says Mansoor Kazerouni, who is designing the project with Page+Steele Architects president Sol Wassermuhl. It will include the new Prosserman Jewish Community Centre where the BJCC currently sits, a new Koffler Centre of the Arts, the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage and a renovated Lipa Green Building for Jewish Community Services.

"There will be one main entrance, the atrium, which everyone enters through, and that gives you a real sense of awareness of what's going on, not just on the campus but in the community," Kazerouni continues. "This design encourages a lot of interaction between various age groups."

Farther north, the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is taking shape as a city within a city, where York Region's 60,000 Jews will be able to come together to experience Jewish life. According to project architect Guela Solow-Ruda, "urbanity means complexity, diversity. Diversity of use – the range of uses on campus are as complex as any city block (residential, recreational, educational, healthcare); diversity of population – all ages, all ethnic groups and all creeds are supported by the amenities and services; diversity of ideas – this is essentially urban, a city."

Nature plays an integral role in this city, Solow-Ruda continues. "It is the centre of the urban design composition; all the built fabric is located around courtyards and gardens, buildings frame public squares, and outdoor amenities create views towards nature."

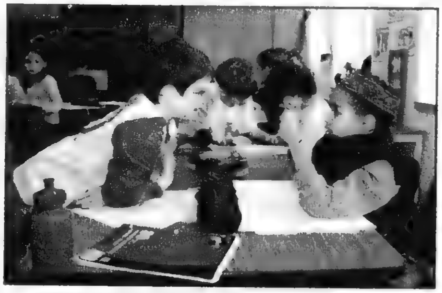
Ultimately, however, "the architecture celebrates Jewish identity through the use of text, the written word, ideas," says Solow-Ruda. "Its Jewishness exists in the wide myriad of activities which it supports."

UJA Federation welcomes provincial government grant

The Government of Ontario's $15 million grant for UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign will be used to help cover the cost of new facilities on three campuses for Jewish life – downtown, in the Bathurst-Sheppard district and the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus on Bathurst, north of Rutherford in the City of Vaughan. The government's $15 million contribution represents less than 5% of over $300 million in anticipated Tomorrow Campaign costs. Provincial funds will be designated primarily for campus community centres.

"We thank the government for its generous participation in our pioneering Tomorrow Campaign initiative, in order for us to enhance services for seniors, children, newcomers and vulnerable members of our community," said UJA Federation Board chair David Engel. "We are exceptionally proud of our Tomorrow Campaign projects, which are attracting worldwide attention and we are particularly proud of the enhanced services that our Tomorrow Campaign campuses will provide with provincial financial assistance."

UJA Federation and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region began discussions with the provincial government about investing in the Tomorrow Campaign more than three years ago. Provincial Finance Minister Greg Sorbara was a guest speaker at the campaign's official inauguration in May 2004.



The Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre is serving downtown residents of all ages

"Since then, with our CJC partners, we met ten times with senior government officials to discuss a provincial partnership in this exceptional project," said Engel. "In addition, our request for funding was backed by extensive documentation highlighting community needs and the way in which our new campuses will be responding to those needs."

"The Tomorrow Campaign represents a shared vision for the Jewish community and the Greater Toronto Area that we are proud to implement," noted Ted Sokolsky, President and CEO, UJA Federation. "It's our contribution to enhancing a remarkable city and the future of Jewish life in the GTA."

Miriam's Judaica store closes after more than four decades

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

After more than 40 years of operating Miriam's Fine Judaica at 3007 Bathurst St., north of Lawrence Avenue, Miriam and William Rosenthal will be retiring and closing their family-run business.

The Rosenthals and their daughter Lillian have considered their Judaica store far more than a business. Over the years, it became a welcoming open-door location where locals as well as visitors to Toronto would drop by to reminisce, ask for some advice, or just shmooze.

"During our selling-out sale, it has been a very emotional time for all of us, because we made so many friends through the store," Miriam said. "People come to the store with flowers and some crying. They ask why we are leaving."

She explained that her husband, who is a rabbi, is 96 and she is 84. They recently celebrated their 63rd wedding anniversary. "It's time for us to retire. It would be too difficult for Lillian to run the store by herself and we are getting on."

William said: "We will miss the store very much. Our customers became family members. We went to their children's bar mitzvahs and other simchahs. People came to our store when they visited from as far away as Sweden and Alaska."

Miriam added, "We were delighted to have helped so many people. One man, as an example, came into the store and had to say Kaddish for his father. He admitted that he didn't know how. My husband taught him how to lay tfillin and how to recite Kaddish."

William said that even non-Jews came to the store.

"A student came with his mother asking if we could help him with an essay on the Holocaust. We were delighted to help and he did very well on his essay. For many years, his mother sent us a Rosh Hashanah card every year."

Miriam (Schwarcz) was born into a wealthy Orthodox family in Komarno, Czechoslovakia, in 1922. Until March 1944, life in Komarno was relatively calm.

Miriam had just become engaged to William who lived in Miskolc, Hungary. They had planned a large elegant wedding and everything was ordered and ready. Then the Final Solution was put into motion.

Jews were not allowed to travel. On April 5, 1944, disguised, with false papers and wearing a cross, Miriam slipped into Miskolc. The rabbi told them, "You came and you are engaged. We have to make a wedding. It will be tonight." The next day, the bombing began and the Germans came to Miskolc.

William was taken to a forced labour camp. Miriam was sent to Auschwitz, where she discovered that she was pregnant and had to keep her pregnancy a secret. She was sent to Augsburg, Germany, to work in a Messerschmitt factory. One day, the SS came to look for pregnant women to send them to the gas chambers. She was the only one they found.

The SS took her to Kaufering camp, where there were six other pregnant Hungarian women. The seven women gave birth. The Germans knew the war was ending and they wanted to show the world that they didn't kill infants. But then the entire camp was evacuated and they were all sent to Dachau. They were liberated by the Americans.

Shoeless and emaciated, Miriam found her way back to Komarno and sent a message to Miskolc that she was alive. When she and William were reunited, William could not believe that Miriam was alive and they had a son, Leslie.

The three Rosenthals came to Canada in 1947, leaving behind remnants of their families. William worked stuffing mattresses in Toronto. Two years later, someone heard William daven at shul and asked if he would come to Timmins to serve as rabbi and religious teacher there. Their daughter Lillian was born in the northern Ontario town.

The following year, they moved to Sudbury, where William also served as rabbi and where their third child, Murray, was born. In 1956, they moved back to Toronto to give their children a Jewish environment and education. They opened Miriam's Fine Judaica shortly after their return to the city.

The couple now have seven grandchildren and seven great-grandchildren.

Miriam said it is painful for the couple to have a selling-out sale, because "it brings back so many memories."

She added: "We want to thank the many people who supported us. I didn't realize that Miriam's Judaica was much more than just a business. It was our outreach."

Push for Wallenberg stamp may be too late

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Raoul Wallenberg

A Czech immigrant who was instrumental in getting a Mississauga street named after Holocaust hero Raoul Wallenberg has not given up hope that Canada will issue a commemorative stamp to coincide with the 60th anniversary of the Swedish diplomat's death.

Mike Janecek has been pushing the most recent request for the stamp since early this year, but he has been told that his efforts weren't in time to mark the July 12 anniversary of Wallenberg's death.

"It is unfortunately too late to consider a stamp for this year, as the 2007 stamp program was announced in May 2006," Jim Phillips, Canada Post's director of stamp services, wrote to Janecek on Feb. 13.

"However, I will be pleased to ensure that this suggestion is brought to the attention of [Canada Post's] Stamp Advisory Committee for consideration in future stamp programs and the 100th anniversary of his birth in 2012."

Janecek, spokesperson for the Mississauga Wallenberg Committee, rejects that proposal. "I wrote [to Phillips] that it would be more fitting on the 60th anniversary of his tragic death in 1947." Israel and the United States have both issued stamps honouring the Swedish envoy.

Janecek said he has run up against various "stumbling blocks" over the years. In 1987, the committee proposed to then-Liberal senator Lorna Marsden, who was chair of the Stamp Advisory Committee at the time, that a postage stamp to honour Wallenberg be struck.

Two years later, when the request was renewed, "the Canada Post officer at that time stuck to the rule and the sentence I'll never forget – that no living person shall be honoured except the sovereign," Janecek said.

It is widely believed Wallenberg died in the notorious Lubyanka KBG prison in Moscow in 1947. A monument commemorating the Swedish diplomat was unveiled in London by Queen Elizabeth in 1987 indicating that he lived from 1912 to 1947.

Janecek, longtime publisher of the Czech-language newspaper Kanadske Listy (Canadian Pages), has called on federal politicians for help, but so far, he's had no luck. The Mississauga Wallenberg Committee has circulated a petition promoting creation of the stamp and Janecek believes that with enough public pressure, the Post Office might yet issue it.

Rabbi Lawrence Englander, a member of the Mississauga Wallenberg Committee, believes such a stamp would have a beneficial educational value.

"I'm thrilled about Mike Janecek's efforts to obtain a stamp commemorating Raoul Wallenberg," he said. "Among other things, it will make Wallenberg more of a household name and more and more Canadians will get to know his story, which is one that is certainly worthy of being told."

Nicole Lemire, a spokesperson for Canada Post, said that in addition to the request coming too late, the Crown corporation focuses on the positive when issuing commemorative stamps. Stamps generally commemorate the birth of great Canadians, not their deaths.

"It's definitely on our books for the 100th anniversary of his birth in 2012," she said.

As a young man in Prague, he was studying agriculture when the democratic government was brought down by Communists. Like thousands of others, he fled the country, finding refuge briefly in West Germany before immigrating to Sweden. There he heard about how Wallenberg, a diplomat posted in Budapest, issued fake documents and used his influence to protect 100,000 Hungarian Jews from certain death at the hands of the Nazis.

After the war, Wallenberg was arrested by the Soviets and was never heard from again.

Janecek met Wallenberg's family and watched as the Swedish government of the day made ineffective requests to the Soviets to reveal the former diplomat's fate.

Janecek moved to Canada in 1951 but continued to follow the case. Though he's not Jewish, he said that as "a democrat," he felt Wallenberg's actions should be remembered.

In 1984 he helped convince the City of Mississauga to name a street after the diplomat (Wallenberg Crescent, near City Hall, has 104 homes), and a year later, he was part of an effort to have the Canadian government confer honorary citizenship on him.

Janecek believes that "what [Wallenberg] did should not be forgotten. When you ask young people especially if they ever heard of him, they say they did not… A postage stamp would make people realize what this man did and [why] he should not be forgotten."

Most Winograd coverage misses the point

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

It was no surprise that last week's release of the interim Winograd report on the political and military shortcomings of Israel's war last summer with Hezbollah elicited a huge reaction within its borders.

But possibly because of other important domestic and international stories, with very few exceptions, the Canadian media treated the report proportionately, covering it fairly and accurately.

Most major newspapers ran editorials. In "Lessons from Lebanon" (May 1), the National Post focused initially on the Winograd Commission's "devastatingly critical [report] of both Israeli politicians and senior military commanders" for Israel's "failed" war.

But the paper then turns its attention to the lesson of Winograd: the need for Israel to quickly and effectively adopt the recommendations concerning military preparedness for what the Post calls "the coming conflict" with Hamas.

In the Post's view, Hamas is biding its time to build up its arms in an effort to imitate Hezbollah and plan for a war with Israel.

The Globe and Mail's May 1 editorial, "Calling Olmert to account," similarly begins by noting how Winograd lays the blame for last summer "squarely at the feet of Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, which is where it belongs." It then compars Olmert's "disastrous conduct of the war "to George Bush's "ineptitude" in Iraq.

However, in writing that "Mr. Olmert's failings have cost him the public support he needs to negotiate effectively with the Palestinians," the paper assumes that there is a possibility of negotiating with a Hamas-dominated PA that remains adamantly opposed to recognizing Israel.

Most Israeli analysts reject such a prospect. Even if Olmert had succeeded last summer and found himself popular with the Israeli public, there would still be no chance for negotiations with the Palestinians.

Indeed, in their May 2 Globe and Mail opinion piece, "Olmert has little room to manoeuver," Israel analysts Cameron Brown and Jonathan Spyer argue that while Winograd has been damning of Israel's political leadership, Palestinian "intransigence and growing Islamist radicalism" have created an impasse for any Israeli leader who might conceivably replace Olmert (and Defence Minister Amir Peretz).

Brown and Spyer also break with the conventional wisdom that last summer's war was a failure. They argue that Israel inflicted substantial punishment on Hezbollah and forced an "enhanced," if flawed, UN presence in southern Lebanon that "restricts Hezbollah's freedom of action."

Brown and Spyer note that the Winograd report does not condemn Israel for having gone to war against Hezbollah, but rather faults Israel's major strategic blunders – both political and military – that prevented a much more successful operation.

Reports are now surfacing that, with Iranian and Syrian assistance, whatever setbacks Hezbollah may have incurred, it is rearming for another possible confrontation with Israel.

Brown and Spyer believe that Winograd actually has a positive implication – to serve as a wake-up call for change in the face of looming dangers: Iran's nuclear threats, a possible Syrian strike on the Golan, renewed aggression by Hezbollah across the Lebanon-Israel border, and increased terrorism from Hamas.

"The question is whether the national calling-to-account currently taking place in Israel will produce a leadership and institutions sufficiently reinvigorated to respond."

Most Israeli experts would agree. The alternative is unthinkable – a lack of preparedness and effective command that would leave Israel vulnerable to defeat.

There is one major factor generally missing in the media coverage: the observation that only a nation strong and self-confident in its democratic institutions and capable of self-correction could have publicly released such a critical report, to the delectation of its sworn enemies. Yet the report is also a warning to them: Israel will be far better prepared in the future.

As the influential Frankfurter Allgmeine Zeitung said: "Israel once again makes it clear that, despite certain 'adaptations' to the ways of the region, it has the democratic powers of criticism and self-criticism which one looks for in vain elsewhere in this part of the world."

Last URO office closes

"As time marches on, the number of claimants become fewer and fewer, and the URO found it economically unviable to keep open an office. We'll do whatever we can to assist survivors."

According to English, the URO in Toronto assisted about 2,000 survivors a year and was instrumental in helping them acquire more than $5 million in reparation payments.

The first URO offices sprung up in what was then known as West Germany. In the intervening years, offices were opened in Israel, the United States, Canada, Europe and South America.

During the first few years, operations in Canada were financed by the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany and administered by the Canadian Jewish Congress.

Claims Conference spokesperson Hillary Kessler-Godin, in an interview from New York City, said, "In the mid-1950s, we provided a loan to the URO to help it establish a global network of offices to assist survivors in filing claims under the German Federal Indemnification Law, which the Claims Conference negotiated. The URO repaid the entire loan."

Montreal service helps survivors

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — When the United Restitution Organization (URO) office in Montreal closed its doors at the end of 2002, its records went into Canadian Jewish Congress national archives, but the move had little effect on survivors.

That's because in February of that year, the local Jewish community had already established an all-in-one claims resource service called the Survivor Assistance Office, housed at the Cummings Jewish Centre for Seniors (CJCS).

The office was initially set up as a pilot project modelled after similar assistance offices established in three U.S. cities. The idea was to have one central place that could handle the complex array of restitution, pension, insurance, compensation, slave labour and other claims related to the Holocaust.

As with the U.S. cities, initial funding came from the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany, but funding has since become part of the core budget of CJCS, said Myra Giberovitch, CJCS' supervisor of services for survivors and their families.

"It was determined that we needed a sort of 'one stop shopping' office where survivors would not get the runaround and get a broad range of services," she said.

Igor Epshtein, who has run the assistance office since 2003, said there has not been a need to refer cases to the now-closed URO office in Toronto, because his office handles all types of cases, which number in the hundreds each year.

Montreal's survivor community numbers about 6,000.

The assistance office is even authorized to certify "life certificates" for survivors receiving pensions from Germany who must prove each year that they are still alive and, therefore, eligible to keep getting a pension.

Epshtein also noted that unlike the URO, which claimed up to 10 per cent of compensation money as payment for its services, Survivor Assistance Office services are free of charge.

"I have even received calls from Israel and California," he said.

Other survivor services at CJCS include a drop-in centre, an assistance office information line, and emergency assistance programs.

'We welcome and thank the government's participation'

(excluding a "family pavilion" that will house day care/early childhood education programs and seniors programming) is roughly $30 million; and the "recreational or traditional community centre component" of the Vaughan JCC is roughly $30 million, English said. The latter project is expected to be completed in 2009.

English said the federation has yet to determine how the money will be divided among the three campuses. "Lay committees are monitoring and overseeing the development of all three campuses," he added.

Although the Nadal JCC has undergone extensive renovations, there is still "a little work to be done on the downtown campus."

Announcement of the grant followed a series of meetings between government representatives and officials of the federation and Canadian Jewish Congress, English said. The amount of the grant was the same amount the Jewish community delegates had in mind, he added.

The representatives have also made a case for federal funding of the same magnitude, but have not yet received an answer, he said.

English stressed that the $15 million represents only 5 per cent of the expected total cost of the Tomorrow campaign project, which is now about $300 million.

"We always expected that the vast majority of the cost of the project would be borne by private donors," he added, noting that to date, $210 million has been raised for the campaign.

The campuses are intended to serve non-Jewish residents as well as Jewish ones, English said. "We see that downtown particularly, where Jewish Family & Child Service has always served a large number of non-Jewish clients.

"All of the campuses will have facilities and agencies that will be of interest and will provide services to non-Jews. For example, at Central Square [on the site of the current BJCC]… I want to make special note of the rejuvenated and expanded [future] Koffler Centre of the Arts with cultural programs and interests that would really excite all of the residents of the area between Eglinton [Avenue] and Steeles [Avenue.]"

The Vaughan campus, in addition to housing the northern campus of the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (scheduled to open this September), as well as other Jewish schools, will be home to a Mount Sinai Hospital wellness clinic and a number of agencies that will serve all the residents of York Region, English said.

"We welcome the government's participation and we thank them for the grant and their trust in our ability to implement a tremendous vision for the entire community," he said.

Muslim author advocates multi-faith dialogue

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Raheel Raza, a prominent member of the Canadian Muslim community, addressed supporters of the Canadian Friends of Haifa University (CFHU) at its annual general meeting to promote tolerance, understanding and peace.

The author of Their Jihad... Not My Jihad, Raza is on the board of the Muslim Canadian Congress. She is a freelance journalist for the Toronto Star, and the recipient of numerous awards for her interfaith work.

She addressed CFHU board members at Beth Tzedec Synagogue in Toronto on April 26, just one day after returning from Los Angeles where she was invited by the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center to speak at the Museum of Tolerance.

The outspoken advocate for gender equality and multi-faith dialogue promoted the message that we must respect each other's differences and understand our commonalities.

"We live in a world where hatred seems to be the favoured way of living with each other. I also realize that in our community there are two kinds of people. There are those who would spend a lifetime talking about differences and distances… because for them, to divide and rule is a very easy way to grab people's attention. And then there are those who would shorten the distance by building bridges of trust and understanding, focusing more on similarities than differences. I wish to be one of those people," Raza said.

She said that even though she grew up in Pakistan, she had an idea of the hostilities that Jewish communities faced and even knew a little about Jewish history, after having read The Diary of Anne Frank, and seen films with Jewish themes.

But when she moved to Canada, she, too, faced hostility from the Muslim community for sympathizing with Jews.

"What my fellow Muslims don't understand is that in my journey to discover [other religious communities], all I am doing is trying to follow the word of God," she said.

"The more I interact with others, the more I become rooted in my faith. Those who think I am going outside of my faith by befriending people who are not Muslims, they don't understand that this is what roots me in my faith, when I learn more about you."

She quoted a line from the Qur'an that she discovered is very similar to a line in the Talmud that says "humanity is one community."

She said that after having read passages from the Talmud (in English), she realized how many similarities there are between the Muslim and Jewish faiths.

"As I was reading, I thought to myself, every single Muslim I know needs to come to a synagogue and hear what is being said to understand that the message is the same, that we are reaching out to the same God. But through the centuries, you know and I know that this message and others like it have been sidelined and Islam has been subjected to anti-pluralistic, exclusivist interpretation in order to advance both political and religious subversive agendas."

Raheel Raza

Raza said she also identifies with Israel's struggle to defend itself against communities that call for the destruction of the Jewish state.

"Pakistan is the only other country in the world that was created on the basis of religion, and if someone, like neighbouring India, or anyone else said that they don't recognize them, I'm sure the world opinion would be very much against it," she said.

"My firm belief is that Israel needs to be recognized and it has a right to exist just as much as my own native land of Pakistan does," she said, adding that most Pakistanis and Muslims would disagree with her.

There can be no solution to the "Palestinian crisis" until Israel has a partner that recognizes its sovereignty, she said.

Raza also doesn't shy away from challenging people who hold the view that Jews heavily influence foreign policy.

Muslims around the world need to abandon a popular, ignorant belief that whatever is happening in the world is a Jewish conspiracy, she said.

Just two days earlier in Los Angeles, Raza told the gathering that she hopped in an Iranian man's cab to go shopping. She began to make conversation with her driver and asked him how he liked living in the United States.

"He said, 'Well, you know, there's [President] George Bush and those Jews.' Maybe two years ago I would have changed the subject and talked about something else… [but] I asked him, 'When you say "those Jews" what do you mean?' And he said, 'You know, those people run the country.'"

She said she lectured the cab driver for 20 minutes. He was so taken aback, and he asked her if she was a Muslim.

"I am a practising Muslim," she told him. "This is what my faith and your faith, if you happen to be Muslim, tells you, that you do not judge people. I don't know if it made a difference to him, but it made a difference to me."

She said that it is important for people of all faiths to understand that unity does not mean uniformity.

"If we want peace and if we want to live together in harmony, we have to move beyond our differences. We have to have dialogue, we have to build these bridges, we have to have communication."

"I WANT...

Hillel at U of T receives $50,000 grant

Hopes to reach out to more students

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The staff at Hillel of Greater Toronto hope that a $50,000 grant will help them reach their goal of doubling the number of students involved in Jewish campus life.

The Campus Entrepreneurs Initiative is being funded by U.S.-based Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life. The Toronto project aims to give students who are not involved with Hillel the opportunities and resources to "do Jewish" on campus.

Daniel Abramson, the program director at Hillel of Greater Toronto, said this program will give students who wouldn't normally be involved with Hillel the chance to work within their own social networks and create positive Jewish experiences.

"In Toronto, people have so many opportunities because the Jewish community is very dynamic and vibrant. Students on campus have many opportunities that are outside of Hillel… They're getting their Jewish life experiences through synagogues and the community off-campus. This is very positive, but we want to make sure that they have a peer group on campus too," Abramson said.

According to the application sent by Hillel associate executive director Stephanie Krasman and director of Tzedek Hillel Devora Schwartz Waxman, there has been a shift in the Jewish identity of University of Toronto students.

They suggested that Jewish students don't gravitate towards Hillel programming as much as they used to and don't see Jewish involvement on campus as a way to gain leadership skills and experience.

"This grant is meant specifically to allow communities and organizations to reach students who aren't the [day school] graduates who… will automatically be on our mailing list… This gives us the ability to reach students who are not on our radar screen," Abramson said.

"We want students to do things that we haven't thought of before, and we want them to be talking to students who we missed or who missed us."

The grant will allow Hillel to hire 12 students who aren't necessarily interested in Hillel but have had positive Jewish experiences they want to share with other Jewish students.

Those 12 students, who will make up the Campus Entrepreneur team, will get a stipend and a programming budget, Abramson said, adding that the exact figures have yet to be determined.

Applicants must either have participated in a Taglit-birthright israel trip or be eligible to attend next winter's birthright trip. They also have to be available for a summer training session in mid-August, be available for the entire 2007-2008 academic year and have a minimum GPA of 3.0.

"We're looking for people who are outgoing, friendly, have positive Jewish experiences and want to share that with other people," Abramson said.

He said Hillel international is hoping for an increased availability of opportunities for students on campus. Each of the 12 students will be expected to reach 60 more students who are also Jewishly involved on some level, but have little interest in Hillel programming.

"There are some really cool students who are working on this radical Jewish culture club and they deal with klezmer music and obscure films, and they haven't been interested in traditional Hillel programming… This gives them a way to build a program for themselves in an environment where they're being supported by other team members and are given the resources to be able to do it," Abramson said.

"For all those who have been hesitant about getting involved with Hillel for whatever reason… we want people to know that if you're Jewish and on campus, you're important to us."

To apply, visit campusinitiative.org and for more information, contact Daniel Abramson at daniel@hilletoronto.org.

Holocaust historian draws record audience

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Six years ago, Deborah Lipstadt, a professor of modern Jewish and Holocaust studies at Emory University in Atlanta, found herself thrust into the international media spotlight when she was sued for libel by notorious Holocaust denier David Irving.

In a Winnipeg lecture late last month, Lipstadt recalled that her initial reaction to Irving's libel charge against her was to dismiss it as ridiculous. But then she realized that it could be serious.

"The problem is that in British law, the burden of proof is on the person being sued," she explained. "If I ignored the matter, he would win by default and his view of the Holocaust – that there was no German plan to annihilate the Jews, there were no gas chambers, that the number of those murdered was greatly exaggerated and that the guilty parties were rogue German officers – would have been vindicated."

The ensuing trial in London vindicated Lipstadt and left Irving thoroughly discredited and bankrupt. As a result of her courage in standing up to Irving, Lipstadt has been much honoured and has been in great demand as a speaker.

Lipstadt was in Winnipeg April 30 as the guest speaker at the second annual Sol and Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture series (historian Martin Gilbert was the inaugural speaker last year). She addressed an audience of about 800 people, a Winnipeg Jewish community record for a speaker.

The lecture series was inaugurated by the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada to celebrate Sol Kanee's 95th birthday. In welcoming the audience, lecture series co-chair Harold Buchwald paid tribute to Kanee, who died on April 23 at 97, as a man who "cast a giant shadow" on world Jewish history in the second half of the 20th century.

Lipstadt, who earlier in the day told her story to more than 500 high school students from six Winnipeg high schools in a program organized by Holocaust survivor and educator Philip Weiss, did not disappoint the crowd.

The book at the centre of Irving's lawsuit was Denying the Holocaust: The Growing Assault on Truth and Memory, which Lipstadt had published in 1993.

She noted that she devoted just a few paragraphs in the book to Irving, whom she called one of "the most dangerous of deniers" because he had a reputation as a prolific author of history books covering all aspects of World War II.

"His books all had a whiff of anti-Semitism," she said. "His theses were that the Axis powers weren't so bad, the Allies did some things that were wrong and that the Jews got what they deserved."

It wasn't until Irving published Hitler's War in 1978 that he begin to show his true colours and became a champion of Holocaust deniers, she said.

The defence's strategy at her libel trial was to focus on discrediting Irving rather than try to prove the reality of the Holocaust. They called no Holocaust survivors as witnesses nor did they have Lipstadt take the stand. (Irving acted as his own lawyer.) Rather, they recruited a "dream team" of prominent historians to comb through Irving's footnotes and check them for accuracy.

Lipstadt listed several examples of their findings where Irving distorted written records by adding people who weren't there, adding or subtracting words to change the tone of the reports and changing the order of events to further his own agenda.

The defence team was also able to gain access to audio and video of Irving talking to supporters, and even to some passages from his diaries.

The tapes and entries portrayed a man who is bigoted, racist and misogynist, noted Lipstadt, who also gave some examples.

Personally, Lipstadt noted that the hardest part of the process for her was to refuse all media comment, on the strong recommendation of her defence team.

"They cautioned me that British judges dislike individuals involved in legal cases who litigate in the media," she said.

She also spoke of how moved she was by the support and encouragement of Holocaust survivors worldwide.

"The judge's verdict was 320 pages long and, in a unusual move, he read out the entire document in court over two hours," she said. "He laid waste to Irving's arguments. It was an overwhelming moment."

Although she has been described as a hero, she said she didn't feel heroic.

"I was defending myself and my freedom of expression against a liar and a racist. But I became aware that I was representing all the victims of the Holocaust."

Parliamentary motion calls for UN action on Iran

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

The House of Commons' foreign affairs subcommittee on international human rights last week passed a motion calling on the Canadian government to refer the "incitement to genocide" by Iranian officials, including President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, to the United Nations.

The motion states that Canada should also call on the UN Security Council to refer this incitement to the International Criminal Court.

According to former justice minister Irwin Cotler, who is now the Opposition critic for human rights and who put forward the motion, its passing, especially the recommendation to the Security Council, represents a first for a Canadian parliamentary subcommittee.

"This had the full support of Liberal party leadership," said Cotler, referring to Stéphane Dion. "This is not just me or you saying it," he told The CJN, "but a parliamentary subcommittee. This motion is important because it's a statement of a parliamentary consensus.

"It's the first time a parliamentary group is on record in asking to go to the UN," he said.

In a press release from his office, Cotler said that "we are witnessing in Iran the toxic convergence of the advocacy of the most horrific of crimes, namely genocide, imbedded in the most virulent of hatreds, anti-Semitism, propelled by a publicly avowed intent to acquire nuclear weapons and dramatized by the parading on the streets of Tehran a Shihab-3 missile draped in the emblem 'wipe Israel off the map.'"

The motion's preamble states as fact that the Iranian government has consistently violated the Genocide Convention (the Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide, adopted in Resolution 260 of the UN General Assembly on Dec. 9, 1948), through "direct and public incitement" and persistent calls for the "annihilation" of Israel.

Also stated as fact is that such statements violate the "incitement to genocide" statute of the International Criminal Court.

Since Iran also intends to acquire nuclear weapons in violation of UN Security Council resolutions, and since state parties to the Genocide Convention (including Canada) are bound "to prevent the direct and public incitement to commit genocide," Canada, the body of the motion states, calls on the UN "to take such action… for the prevention and suppression of the public and direct incitement to commit genocide by senior Iranian government officials."

Canada also calls on the UN Security Council to refer this incitement to the international court's special prosecutor, "in order to determine the basis of an investigation and prosecution."

The motion passed by a vote of 3-2, with one abstention by the Bloc Québécois. Two Liberal MPs, one of them Cotler, voted in favour, but two Conservatives, Wajid Khan and Kevin Sorenson, opposed the motion.

The subcommittee is chaired by Conservative MP Jason Kenney, who would have voted in the event of a tie.

"Frankly," Cotler said, "I would have thought that Conservatives would have supported such a motion. I was kind of shocked at their opposition." He added that the Jewish community should be wary about handing the Conservatives a "blank cheque" on issues the community might assume they would support.

Cotler said he intends to bring up the motion with Prime Minister Stephen Harper, and is hopeful that the motion will eventually be voted on by the full House.

Last December, Cotler was among several prominent figures, including Harvard law professor Alan Dershowitz and former American ambassador to the UN John Bolton, calling for Ahmadinejad's criminal indictment for advocating that Israel be wiped off the map, contrary to the UN charter and Genocide Convention

Cotler said the subcommittee motion was initially longer, but was shortened after the subcommittee heard testimony from a selection of expert witnesses on issues relevant to the motion.

The next step is that the motion will go before the full foreign affairs committee and then, if passed again, it will go before the entire House of Commons.

Jewish candidates run in Manitoba election

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — It's been many years since a member of the Jewish community here has been elected to the Manitoba Legislature, and that situation is very unlikely to change in the upcoming provincial vote on May 22.

There are three Jewish candidates running this time around, but none of them stands much chance of winning.

The most prominent Jewish candidate is Bernie Bellan, co-owner of the Jewish Post and News, who is the Liberal standardbearer in the south Winnipeg riding of Assiniboia. The third place Liberals held only two seats in the outgoing Legislature and have not been in government in nearly 50 years, which means that almost all Liberal candidates are long shots to win.

Bellan also says openly that he has no interest in the concerns of voters in Assiniboia, nor is he planning to spend much time campaigning. He said he is running strictly to keep the Crocus Fund issue in the forefront of public attention.

The Crocus Fund was a labour-sponsored investment fund that was started in the mid-1990s under the former Conservative government. Investors were allowed generous tax breaks and could redeem their investments after a period of time. Crocus' mandate was to invest in Manitoba companies.

But the fund encountered financial difficulties and halted trading in December 2004. More than 33,000 Manitobans lost money when it collapsed.

Bellan was one of the first to detect problems with the fund. As co-owner of the community's weekly Jewish newspaper and an occasional business writer for the publication, as well as being an investor, he had followed the progress of the fund from the beginning. Early in 2002, he wrote a story raising questions about the operation of the fund and some of its investments. He and the paper were threatened with a lawsuit.

"I have been fighting to make this story public ever since," he said.

Bellan was instrumental in forming a coalition of former Crocus shareholders who have launched a class-action lawsuit and are demanding that the outgoing government launch an inquiry into the fund's collapse. It has also come out that members of the cabinet knew the fund was experiencing problems as early as 2002 but did not take action.

Bellan chose to run in Assiniboia because the current MLA, Jim Rondeau, was the minister responsible for the Crocus Fund at one point.

Alon Weinberg is also running to make a point. The Green Party candidate for Fort Garry, also in south Winnipeg, said he is running to raise the issue of electoral reform.

"People should be co-operating instead of fighting each other," he said.

Weinberg, the founder of Ada'Manitoba, a Jewish ecological group, is running in his third election. He ran unsuccessfully for the Green Party provincially in 2003 and federally in 2004.

Weinberg's friend and fellow Jewish Green Party candidate is musician and environmental activist Nathan Zahn, who is running in the north Winnipeg Kildonan Riding. This is his first attempt at public office.

Orthodox rabbis adjust rules for conversion

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Beis Din is endorsing a decision by the Rabbinical Council of America (RCA) to limit the authority to perform conversions to approved regional rabbinic courts that apply a universal set of halachic guidelines.

The decision by the Toronto Beis Din was taken before a recent RCA convention, which discussed implementing the new conversion protocols, so as to offer converts the certainty that their status as a Jew would be recognized universally.

Rabbi Reuven Tradburks, who attended the conference in Manhattan, said the RCA decision will not be affected by a recent announcement by the Israeli Chief Rabbinate that it will require members of the religious courts to be approved in Israel. The last-minute announcement from Israel prompted cancellation of a news conference to announce an agreement between the RCA, the Beth Din of America and the Chief Rabbinate that will govern Orthodox conversions in North America.

The RCA document is titled Geirus [conversion] Policies and Standards that Will Govern. The RCA is an umbrella organization representing almost 1,000 Orthodox rabbis in North America.

Rabbi Tradburks, the Toronto Beis Din's former secretary, said Toronto already has its own regional court affiliated with the RCA and its conversions have been relying on the same standards set out in the document – except for child conversions – for more than 20 years. The rabbinate in Israel is familiar with the Toronto Beis Din and has confidence in the legitimacy of its conversions, he said, adding the rabbis in New York were surprised by the position taken by the Chief Rabbinate.

Requiring North American rabbis to be approved in Israel was never part of the pre-conference discussions between the two sides, he said.

Tracing the evolution of the new set of conversion standards and policies, Rabbi Tradburks noted that in the past, individual rabbis used their discretion when performing conversions. Sometimes they could be pressured by members of their congregation to perform a conversion, or converts might have shopped around for a rabbi who would be more lenient in applying halachic standards, he said.

"That caused a lot of different standards in conversions throughout North America." In Toronto, conversions were taken out of the hands of individual Orthodox rabbis more than 20 years ago, he said.

Israel's rabbis were not sure whether to accept conversions from North American rabbis they were unfamiliar with (which could affect acceptance of the Jewish status of an immigrant to Israel), and even other North American rabbis were not confident about some conversions.

Establishing regional beit dins gives the RCA – and the Israeli rabbinate – some confidence they will be done properly, Rabbi Tradburks said.

However, it appears "the sticky point for the [Israeli rabbinate] is, 'Can we really trust you as to who will be the rabbis in the regional [beit dins] and can the standards be trusted?'"

Rabbi Tradburks said that in agreeing to be part of the RCA network and abide by its standards, the Beis Din also increased the requirements expected of parents of adopted, non-Jewish children. To convert an infant youngster, parents will have to agree to become Sabbath observant, join an Orthodox congregation, live within walking distance of a synagogue, keep a kosher home and commit to sending their child to a Jewish day school through Grade 12.

In the past, parents had to agree to keep a kosher home, mark the Sabbath and send their child to a day school, preferably an Orthodox one.

Rabbi Tradburks, a member of the RCA's geirus policies and standards task force, voted in favour of the changes. He said it is likely the number of child conversions in Toronto will drop in future years. On average, the Beis Din performs 20 child conversions a year, with slightly more adult conversions. The standards required of adult converts have not changed, he said.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz of Montreal's Congregation Tifereth Beth David Jerusalem, said the new RCA conversion policy appears to provide a second path to conversion of infant children. Pointing to the Geirus document, he said the goal is a complete standard of observance.

"Where this cannot be accomplished, then at the very minimum, if there is significant observance of Shabbat, complete observance of kashrut, a positive attitude towards full mitzvah observance and commitment to Halachah within the basic family unit… conversion of the child may be allowed," the document states.

Rabbi Steinmetz, past president of the Montreal Board of Rabbis, was, however "a bit perturbed" at the Chief Rabbinate for scuttling the agreement with the RCA. While he believes that eventually a deal will be reached, he criticized the rabbinate, saying haredi rabbis control the Chief Rabbinate and are using it "to advance an agenda in which they wish to impose a set of standards on conversions that might be more rigid than modern Orthodox rabbis would do.

"Both sides demand observance, the question is to what level of detail."

And "now they're attempting to choose the rabbis… I think it's just an attempt to control."

Rabbi Steinmetz, who is a member of the RCA-affiliated Beit Din in Montreal, said "the RCA essentially formalized a set of standards that were more or less out there and adhered to." Until now, however, the RCA "allowed a little more autonomy to the regions and rabbis."

Conversions will now be more centralized and standardized. "I'm not thrilled with it, but it's not completely nonsensical."

While he would prefer more local autonomy and respect for the decisions of local rabbis, he said he could live with the changes. But, he continued, he was disturbed by the requirement that conversion rabbis be approved in Israel. That shows "an incredible lack of respect for the modern Orthodox rabbinate in North America. It's shocking."

Throughout Jewish history, rabbinic decision-making was decentralized and diverse. It was considered a "breach of etiquette and a [lack] of respect" for rabbis outside one community to attempt to overrule a local decision, he said.

A Toronto rabbi, who wished to remain anonymous, said the Israeli Chief Rabbinate should not interfere in North American conversions.

"In conversions, each case is different. How can you make a blanket rule?" he asked.

"There's an old tradition in the Talmud of Hillel [a respected first century sage] who took sympathy to a convert without making demands first. How can the rabbinate in Israel dictate? Each case is a little different.

"Certainly we should make demands of every convert. To make it ironclad, it will take away the autonomy of recognized rabbis in every community.

"The haredim have taken over. You can't conceive of the first Chief Rabbis of Israel making these demands, of being so controlling… and laying down rules across the board."

CJC names new Pacific chair

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — Chair Mark Weintraub handed the leadership reigns over to Gerry Cuttler and a new slate of officers were named at Canadian Jewish Congress, Pacific region's triennial meeting this week.

Weintraub held his volunteer position for three years and put in "hours and hours of work," according to Mira Oreck, regional director of CJC.

"It's a long three years for the amount of intensity it entails," Oreck said.

For that reason, the position's three-year term has been changed to a two-year tenure, in accordance with amendments to CJC's national bylaws.

Cuttler has been honorary legal council with CJC, Pacific region, for the past three years and has been in involved with the organization for more than 10 years.

"I'm hoping that my fellow board members are going to help carry the load," he said. "We've got a great staff and everyone's very keen to get on and do some good work."

The Morris Saltzman Award, given to a non-Jew for his or her outstanding contribution to community relations in British Columbia, was also presented at the meeting. This year's recipient is Rev. Barry Cooke, a United Church minister and associate professor of psychology at Simon Fraser University. Rev. Cooke was executive director of the Multifaith Action Society For more than 15 years, and he worked closely with members of the Jewish community.

"Dr. Rev. Cooke has been a wonderful friend and ally in working to build a climate of tolerance and acceptance across the many diverse communities of the province," Oreck said. "For 50 years, he has worked tirelessly in support of interfaith understanding and peace."

Oreck noted that the new board of CJC Pacific region is more balanced in terms of gender and geographic representation than its predecessor, with individuals from the cities of Richmond, Port Moody, Victoria, Vancouver and West Vancouver.

"There will be an increase in the number of women on our board, which was a priority for the outgoing board," she said. "They felt they wanted a more representative sample of the population."

The CJC meeting was held at the JCC of Greater Vancouver and featured Judea Pearl, father of slain Wall Street Journal reporter Daniel Pearl, as keynote speaker on the topic "Carving a Dialogue between Muslims and Jews."

Pearl and his family created the Daniel Pearl Foundation in memory of his son, who was killed by Islamists after being kidnapped in Pakistan, to promote cross-cultural understanding, combat geographical and religious hatred, encourage responsible and creative journalism and unite people through the universal language of music.

BY LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

Analysis

By all accounts, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert should have been history.

The Winograd Commission's interim report issued April 30 on the conduct of last summer's Second Lebanon War could not have been more scathing. The paragraph on the prime minister's responsibility for the failures and shortcomings in top level decision-making speaks for itself.

"The prime minister," it says, "made up his mind [to go to war] hastily, despite the fact that no detailed military plan was submitted to him and without asking for one."

Further, "His decision was made without close study of the complex features of the Lebanon front and of the military, political and diplomatic options available to Israel."

And, "He made his decision without systematic consultation despite not having experience in foreign and military affairs."

Ostensibly, the damning report should have been just the stick Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni needed to unseat Olmert. For months, Livni had been crafting a move to take over as Kadima party boss and prime minister. Her assumption was that a critical assessment of Olmert's conduct of the war coupled with his close to zero popularity ratings would force him to step down.

Kadima lawmakers, she thought, would not tolerate an increasingly unelectable leader who could cost them their parliamentary seats.

In the weeks leading up to the report, Livni's close ally, party Knesset whip Avigdor Yitzhaki, openly approached potential Kadima rebels trying to build a pro-Livni camp ready to move at the right time. The influential internal security minister, Avi Dichter, was supposed to join at a crucial juncture to create a critical mass against Olmert.

But there was one thing the would-be rebels had not counted on: the power of incumbency.

As soon as the Winograd report was published, Olmert and his aides used threats and promises to derail the planned "coup." Some potential rebels were offered important new posts that would open up with a planned government reshuffle; others were threatened with a premature end to their political careers.

All were warned that a move against Olmert would spark new elections Kadima would lose.

Less than 48 hours after the report was published, Livni's coup attempt had been stifled.

Still, Olmert remains vulnerable. There are three ways he could lose his hold on power: if he fails to keep control of Kadima, if he loses his Knesset majority or if mounting public pressure on him to resign becomes intolerable.

For now, his hold on Kadima seems secure, but there are rumblings in the party about replacing him with former prime minister Shimon Peres rather than Livni. The idea is that Peres would be a caretaker prime minister until Kadima chooses a new leader. That would give some of Livni's rivals for the top spot – Housing Minister Meir Sheetrit, Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz and Dichter – time to organize leadership bids.

Olmert, however, is moving swiftly to head off the Peres push the same way he quashed Livni's attempt.

To keep his Knesset majority, Olmert has been strengthening ties with his junior coalition partners and wooing the fervently Orthodox United Torah Judaism party. He has developed particularly good relations with Yisrael Beiteinu's Avigdor Lieberman and Shas leader Eli Yishai.

With them and the Pensioners' Party he has a base of 59 seats in the 120-member Knesset, and together with Labor, a solid majority of 78. The weak link is Labor, which is under mounting pressure to pull out over Winograd. Hence Olmert's effort to bring in the six-member UTJ faction, which would leave him with a majority of 65 even if Labor bolts.

To ease public disaffection, Olmert intends to come out with a new peace initiative, his confidants acknowledge. This would coincide with another major element of his survival strategy: the establishment of a second Olmert administration in June, after Labor elects a new leader.

The aim would be to regain public confidence by appointing strong ministers to the key defence, finance and foreign affairs portfolios, and pressing a peacemaking agenda. Again, the problem with this plan is Labor. Party secretary Eitan Cabel and leadership candidates Ophir Pines-Paz, Ami Ayalon and Dani Yatom are calling for Labor's peremptory withdrawal from the government if Olmert continues to head it.

Labor's dilemma, however, is far from simple. Pulling out of the Olmert government could spark early elections that right-wing Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu would probably win.

On the other hand, if Labor stays in the coalition, its new leader, probably Ayalon or former prime minister Ehud Barak, would likely become defence minister in Olmert's "second administration," a good base from which to build a future campaign for prime minister against a weak incumbent.

Netanyahu is biding his time, waiting for public pressure to force an election. He had toyed with the idea of generating a motion of "constructive no-confidence," in which 61 Knesset members would back him for prime minister, enabling him to form a government without having to go to the polls. But he dropped the plan when finding those 61 votes proved more difficult than he anticipated, and when close confidants pointed out that he stood to gain far more via the landslide election victory public opinion polls are predicting.

Likud's tactics will be to maintain the anti-Olmert pressure generated by the mass rally it helped organize in Tel Aviv on May 3. An estimated 150,000 people from the left and the right filled Rabin Square in a rare bipartisan demonstration demanding that Olmert go.

Olmert is facing other obstacles, too. In the coming weeks the commission will release his testimony. If it transpires that he tried to shift blame to his predecessor – Kadima founder Ariel Sharon – he could find himself in serious trouble inside the party.

For now the focus is on the commission's specific criticisms of the prime minister: the hasty decision to go to war; the loose definition of war aims; the failure to adapt to emerging conditions. This pits the strong public desire for change against the power of incumbency in an as yet unresolved battle.

But the findings of the Winograd Commission raise far deeper questions about Israel's leadership and future. Foremost among them: is the country capable at this critical time of producing a leadership proficient and strong enough to fight another war if need be, or steer the country toward peace with its neighbours if and when the opportunity presents itself?

This, more than Ehud Olmert or Tzipi Livni's political future, is the deeply disturbing question the Winograd Commission poses.

Sarkozy seen as Israel's friend

By RINA BASSIST
JTA

PARIS — Jewish groups were quick to offer congratulations to Nicolas Sarkozy after his victory in the French presidential elections.

Sarkozy, head of the ruling Union for a Popular Movement (UMP), defeated Socialist party candidate Ségolène Royal in Sunday's runoff.

He garnered some 53 per cent to Royal's 47 per cent in the election, which featured a huge voter turnout.

The former interior minister was seen by Jewish voters as a friend to Israel and an important figure in the fight against anti-Semitism. Soon after his opponent conceded, Jewish groups came out with their good wishes.

"At a time when French Jews felt directly threatened by the rise in violent anti-Semitism in Paris and elsewhere across France a few years ago, Sarkozy played a critical role in moving the French government to finally recognize the gravity of the problem and to do what is necessary to address the ill winds that not only threaten the largest Jewish community in western Europe, but, as we know from history, would ultimately pose a threat to wider French society," American Jewish Committee executive director David Harris said in a statement.

The AJCommittee recalled that, during that period, Sarkozy was instrumental in stepping up police protection around Jewish buildings and schools, and arresting and prosecuting those who committed anti-Semitic acts. He told the group in a Washington address in 2004 that he would "consider any insult against Jews an insult against France."

CRIF, the French Jewish community's umbrella group, addressed its "warmest and most respectful congratulations" to Sarkozy in a Sunday statement.

"Your position statements during the electoral campaign carry much hope for a France that needs to be reconciled with itself," CRIF president Roger Cukierman wrote. "I was touched by what you said and I understand that you intend to be a standard bearer of the French values we so cherish, those of a republic that… respects every individual and leaves no room for intolerance, racism and anti-Semitism."

In a race that offered a clear choice between conservative and liberal policy, the voters gave Sarkozy, 52, a clear mandate for his economic and social reforms when he takes office May 16.

The grandson of a Greek Jew and the son of a Hungarian aristocrat, Sarkozy has pledged to initiate tougher rules to make it more difficult for immigrants to bring extended families to France. Among the economic reforms Sarkozy has pledged to push through early on are abolishing a tax on overtime, cutting the inheritance tax and requiring the unemployed to take work that is offered.

Known as an American-style, law-and-order politician, Sarkozy had earned points in the Jewish community for his hard line against Muslim unrest in France, including anti-Semitic attacks – though he drew fire from some liberal and immigrant groups for referring to some of the rioters as "rabble."

In his victory speech at party headquarters in Paris, Sarkozy mentioned France's relationship with the United States. "True friends can accept each other, even if they have differences of opinion," he said.

Frédéric Encel, a professor at the prestigious Science-Po Institute, said Sarkozy's unusual willingness to be associated with the United States also strengthens hope for good relations between France and Israel. "Nicolas Sarkozy is by far the most pro-Israeli French presidential figure Israel could have hoped for," he said.

The fact that Sarkozy had not been trained at France's national public administration school or by the Foreign Ministry "is a great advantage for Israel, as he is not committed to traditional diplomacy," Encel said. "Royal would have stuck with the existing approach," he added, allowing people like her adviser Jean Louis Baillancourt, a member of a pro-Palestinian organization, to lead French diplomacy.

Royal, 53, who has trailed in the polls since Sarkozy won the first round of voting on April 22, had warned that electing Sarkozy might spark the kind of rioting that took place in the suburbs last year. She said his candidacy represented "a dangerous choice.

"It is my responsibility to alert people to the risk of [his] candidature with regard to the violence and brutality that would be unleashed in the country," said Royal, who, during a televised debate May 2, accused Sarkozy of "political immorality."

Both candidates symbolized a break with the old guard. Both were born after World War II and said they were intent on bringing a real change after Chirac's 12-year rule. But the similarities ended there, and French voters had to choose between two very distinct personalities, attitudes and political programs.

Sarkozy entered politics as a protégé of Chirac, but the two had a falling-out that remains to this day, when Sarkozy backed Chirac's rival for the presidency in 1995.

The Jewish community has seen Sarkozy as a friend of Israel, though he maintains that the Jewish state must make concessions to allow the Palestinians to establish a viable state. But he has made clear to the Palestinian Authority that there is no justification for violence to achieve its means.

In an interview in the Jerusalem Post, Sarkozy called the 2002 Saudi peace initiative "constructive." Under the two-state proposal, Arab states would recognize Israel if it withdrew to its pre-1967 borders. The proposal also calls for a "just solution" for Palestinian refugees.

In the interview, Sarkozy said, "Only if Israel is guaranteed that its existence will not be threatened and the Palestinians are allowed to form a viable state can we achieve a durable and viable solution."

One Jewish voter said, "As far as Israel is concerned, Royal has nothing to offer us, compared to Sarkozy."

Outside a synagogue in the Jewish Quarter, one Sarkozy voter rued some of Royal's supporters. "As a Jew, I don't like the fact that many pro-Palestinian radical activists participate at her meetings," said Armand, who asked that his last name not be used. "I think this is dangerous.

"Sarkozy, on the other hand, is one of the only [future] heads of states to have gone to the United States to meet President Bush. I'm not a fan of Bush, but still. In any case, I don't think that Sarkozy is a fascist, as some people try to make us believe."

Candidates had eyes on Israel

JTA

Comment

French Jews made it clear throughout the presidential campaign that candidates' positions on Israel were a key factor for Jewish voters.

There was little surprise, therefore, that advisers and allies to Nicolas Sarkozy and Ségolène Royal were out in force at Israel's glamorous Independence Day reception here. There was Jack Lang, a former culture minister and an adviser to Royal. There was Simone Veil, a former health minister and a popular public figure allied with Sarkozy.

A more unexpected guest at the April 24 event was Julian Dray, spokesperson for Royal's Socialist Party and a close adviser to the candidate. Observers said they couldn't recall Dray ever attending the event before.

Dray has clashed with the Jewish community over reports that most Jews back Sarkozy, a conservative, in his bid to succeed Jacques Chirac, who is from Sarkozy's Union for a Popular Movement Party.

But just days after the first round of balloting April 22 and a short time before the runoff between Sarkozy and Royal, there was Dray talking with Israeli Ambassador Daniel Shek and having his picture taken.

The celebration offered a golden opportunity for politicians across the spectrum to be seen with Jewish leaders and emphasize their sympathy for Israel, and no one was going to miss out.

The concept of appealing to specific ethnic communities is foreign to French political culture, which stresses the country's identity as a melting pot. But Royal and Sarkozy seemed to play by new rules in a new political atmosphere – one that favours U.S.-style politicking.

The candidates' private lives were more exposed, and they fought for TV time. Their campaigns were focused on interest groups – for Royal, immigrants and suburbanites; for Sarkozy, the middle class, far-right and liberal professionals.

Outreach to the Jews appeared to be part of this new strategy.

In criticizing Jewish leaders several months ago for backing Sarkozy, Dray expressed a certain bitterness among Socialist Party leaders. French Jews traditionally have voted Socialist, but with the French left sour on Israel, more and more Jews declared their support for Sarkozy.

No opinion polls were available on how Jews voted in the runoff. But conversations with Jewish leaders and grassroots community members showed that they they believed most French Jews backed Sarkozy in the first round of voting, and did so again in the run-off.

"I've never voted before," said Dominique, a shop worker in Paris' old Jewish quarter who asked that her last name not be used. "This time I felt that I had to choose, to support Sarkozy's warm relations with Israel and with the Jewish community, and at the same time reward the one who was able to take down" far-right candidate Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Since the Palestinian intifadah began in 2000, the Jewish community has reoriented itself toward Israel in several ways, such as rising aliyah, investment in real estate and business opportunities. Most importantly, they have offered strong political support for Israel's leadership, not always a popular position in France.

French Jews see Sarkozy as a good friend of Israel. Indeed, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu refer to Sarkozy, who had a Jewish grandfather, as a personal friend.

As interior minister, Sarkozy took a strong stance against anti-Semitism. His tough stand on immigration also seemed to please most French Jews.

For her part, Royal ran into hot water when, during a tour of the Middle East, she met with Hezbollah politicians in Lebanon and looked on quietly as they compared Israel to the Nazis. — R.B.

Hezbollah won by controlling media: report

JTA

BOSTON — Hezbollah won a propaganda victory in last summer's war with Israel by its strict and undemocratic control of the media, a report concluded.

The paper, released by Marvin Kalb and Carol Saivetz through the Shorenstein Center at Harvard University's Kennedy School of Government, asserted that the media became "a weapon of modern warfare" in the asymmetrical conflict. They wrote that it "shows how an open society, Israel, is victimized by its own openness and how a closed sect, Hezbollah, can retain almost total control of the daily message of journalism and propaganda."

Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah the leader of Hezbollah

Reporters were given open access in Israel but only very choreographed access within Lebanon.

"Hezbollah provided only limited access to the battlefield, full access to an occasional guided tour and encouraged visiting journalists to check its own television network, Al-Manar, for reports and information about the war," the report said. "Al-Manar was to Hezbollah what Pravda was to the Soviet Union."

This resulted in the media's portrayal of Israel as the aggressor, despite the fact that the war had been sparked by Hezbollah's deadly July 12 raid, and constant depiction of Israel's attacks as disproportionate. The authors wrote that the media's increased coverage of "movement of troops and the rocketing of villages," albeit unintentionally, "also became an extremely valuable intelligence asset for both Israel and Hezbollah, and Hezbollah especially exploited it."

They especially cited "UNIFIL's [United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon] gift" to the terrorist group when it posted detailed Israeli military movements online for public access. Bloggers on both sides of the war had a negative and "overwhelming" effect on reporting, creating "nonstop pressure on journalists to look over their shoulders – to conform either to extremes on both sides or to stick to the middle of public opinion," the authors wrote.

"If 'disproportionality' was the theme of the day, most reporters would try to do stories supporting or rejecting the theme but always keeping it in play. It was easier and safer to be in step with the public than to be walking into the wind."

More U.K. journalists reject boycott

JTA

LONDON — Journalists at Britain's Independent Television Network joined BBC colleagues last week in calling for a new vote on the decision by a journalists' union to boycott Israeli goods.

More than 220 BBC employees sent a letter to the National Union of Journalists.

"We call on the union to hold a ballot of all members to see whether they support the view… on an issue which could have a profound effect on the way all British journalists are viewed at home and abroad," it read.

On May 1, several dozen journalists from ITN, Britain's largest independent television broadcaster, added their signatures to the letter, which was published on the anti-Semitism discussion forum Engage.

In April, the 150 people present at the union's annual delegates meeting voted by a slim margin to urge members to boycott Israeli goods. Jewish groups and media interests such as the Guardian newspaper denounced the move as counter to journalistic ideals of impartiality.

The union has more than 39,000 members. Petitioners said a new vote is needed in part because of the small percentage of members on hand for the first vote.

Israel Briefs

Katsav hearing inconclusive

Israel's attorney general postponed a decision about indicting Israeli President Moshe Katsav. A hearing last week at the Justice Ministry on rape and breach of trust allegations against the suspended president was expected to produce a decision from Attorney General Menachem Mazuz. Instead, he ceded to Katsav's attorneys, who argued they needed more time to address the accusations against their client. They agreed to hold a second hearing in two weeks. Katsav's term ends in July. He is immune from prosecution while in office, but he has vowed to step down if indicted.

New Bishara allegations

A fugitive Israeli Arab ex-lawmaker is suspected of helping Hezbollah during last year's Lebanon war, police said. In a new statement on the case against Azmi Bishara, who fled Israel last month to avoid arrest and then resigned from the Knesset, police said there was evidence that Bishara gave Hezbollah information on locations to shell during the 34-day conflict and advice on waging psychological warfare against Israel. In exchange, police allege, Bishara was paid hundreds of thousands of dollars via Jerusalem money-changers. Bishara, who faces charges of treason and espionage, has denied wrongdoing and vowed to clear his name. If he returns to Israel and is convicted, he could be sentenced to life in prison. Bishara, who headed the anti-Zionist Balad Party, infuriated many in Israel with his solidarity visits to Lebanon and Syria, and his agitation against the Jewish state.

Saudis to give PA $250M

Saudi Arabia is giving the Palestinian Authority $250 million (US) on top of Arab League funds already earmarked for the Hamas-led government, PA finance minister said. Salam Fayyad told Reuters that he expected the money to arrive within weeks. The Arab League currently funnels about $55 million a month to the Palestinian Authority. The international community has isolated the Palestinian Authority since the election last year of Hamas, a terror group that rejects Israel's existence. Fayyad, a member of the Hamas-dominated national unity government, is considered a moderate. U.S. banking rules that ban dealing with entities that deal with terrorists have hampered direct funding to the Palestinian Authority. Fayyad said the Saudis obtained assurances from U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice that such rules would not apply if the Saudis funneled the money to the Palestine Liberation Organization, which is run by the Fatah Party.

Firm buys Times building

An Israeli conglomerate is buying the New York Times building. Africa Israel Investments Ltd. announced last week that it would buy the midtown Manhattan landmark for $525 million (US). The newspaper's staff is expected to relocate in July. According to Ma'ariv, Israeli investors hold nearly $4 billion in prime New York real estate.

N.J. communities launch $50M day school campaign

By JOHANNA GINSBERG
New Jersey Jewish News

WHIPPANY, N.J. — New Jersey's largest Jewish federation has launched a $50-million (US) community-wide campaign that is being hailed as a groundbreaking collaborative effort in support of Jewish day school education.

Eleven local families have committed $13.5 million toward the MetroWest Day School Campaign, which was launched officially on April 29.

Under the plan, the three day schools in the federation's service area will retain their own endowment funds while drawing on a community fund and a matching pool.

Organizers said the goal is to make day schools more affordable and offer a standard of academic excellence equal to any private school in the area.

The campaign is being co-ordinated by the Jewish Community Foundation (JCF) of MetroWest, the planned giving and endowment arm for United Jewish Communities of MetroWest N.J. The federation serves Essex and Morris counties, and has its roots in Newark.

"We want to increase enrolment at all three schools," said Kim Hirsh, endowment development officer of the MetroWest foundation, who will staff the campaign.

"We want to make day school available to all Jewish families. We have learned that enrolment is not just a matter of affordability. It's also a matter of academic excellence."

The three schools are the Orthodox Joseph Kushner Hebrew Academy/Rae Kushner Yeshiva High School, the Conservative Solomon Schechter Day School and the nondenominational Nathan Bohrer-Abraham Kaufman Hebrew Academy.

The campaign is the latest in a series of high-profile projects in support of day schools, said Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of the Boston-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), a partner in the local project.

Rabbi Elkin said, however, that the depth of the collaboration and the amount of money being raised for just three schools are unprecedented.

"This is part of a wave of something new, but this is bigger than any other effort out there," he said. "A goal of $50 million is a significant amount of money for three schools – very significant. It's also very significant that federation has dedicated staff to this project. In that sense it's pace-setting."

Rabbi Elkin said the campaign "raises the bar substantially as to what is possible."

Similar recent projects nationally include a $45-million gift for excellence in Boston's day schools, a $50-million campaign to help reduce tuition in Chicago-area day schools, and $20 million for tuition assistance in Cleveland.

But these areas have more than three schools to serve, Rabbi Elkin said.

He added that the effort moves day school education "to the front burner of the community," a shift he said has been occurring slowly around the United States over the last 10 years.

Part of that shift has been driven by studies showing that those with a day school education are more likely to have connections with Jewish life into adulthood, from marrying Jews to affiliating with shuls.

The campaign was described as a "coming of age" for the Jewish community by Rabbi Irving "Yitz" Greenberg, who spoke at a ceremony announcing the launch.

Rabbi Greenberg, president of the Jewish Life Network and a PEJE co-founder, said the project marks "a fundamental transformation of the Jewish community, when we say whatever it takes to flourish in freedom, that's what we should do."

The local schools collectively are spending $2.3 million on scholarships, which are largely supported through fundraising and UJC MetroWest

"We know this is not enough," UJC MetroWest president Kenneth Heyman said in a statement. "The wealthy can afford tuition, moderate-income families are on scholarships, and those 'in the middle' are getting squeezed out."

UJC MetroWest's Jewish Community Foundation has donated $1 million to the campaign.

The three participating schools have said that the way the funds are structured was critical in securing their commitment and participation. The schools will design their own tuition reduction and academic enhancement programs, but will also take part in community-wide initiatives funded through the community fund.

The fund will be governed by a day school council with representatives from each school, as well as from UJC MetroWest and JCF MetroWest. It will also have independent members.

According to Hirsh, the impetus for the campaign came at least in part from Jerry and Paula Gottesman of Morristown, N.J. They began a program at the Hebrew Academy of Morris County that capped tuition for middle-income families.

The program is now widely considered a national model, and both the Schechter and Kushner schools say they will look to it as they design their own.

"Middle-income people could not afford to send their kids," said Jerry Gottesman, chairman of Edison Properties, a real-estate, parking and storage business. "It was either kids on scholarship or the children of dentists and doctors. There was no middle ground."

Funds from the Gottesmans also enabled the Hebrew Academy to begin implementing academic enhancement projects. Last fall, the academy was named a National Blue Ribbon School of Excellence by the U.S. Department of Education.

"Our open houses usually draw two to three families. This year we've had 15 to 20," said Naomi Bacharach, the academy's director of marketing and development. "The interest level in our school is soaring. We are also seeing increased retention from kindergarten to first grade, when we usually have a dip, and in the middle school."

Administrators at the Schechter and Kushner schools say they have families whose children either leave or don't apply due to tuition costs.

"Consider a family making $200,000 with four kids in day school," said Kushner executive director Michael Grad. "The tuition bill can be more than $60,000. Can they make it?

"If they were making $50,000, it wouldn't be an issue," he said, because a family in that financial situation would be getting assistance.

Kushner has seen its enrolment drop from 847 students to 747 in the last five years, which Grad called a "significant" change, one he believes is due at least in part to rising tuition.

Schechter families face similar financial challenges, combined with the fact that day school is not as inevitable an option in the Conservative movement as it is among the Orthodox, said Schechter's head of school, Joyce Raynor.

"We have anecdotal evidence of people who say, 'We're leaving. Please understand we love the school but our financial situation has changed' or 'We're struggling with three children in the school' or 'I've lost my job,'" Raynor said. "Where do they go? They go to public school."

This shivah is all fun and games

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

When you think of a shivah, it's usually with some solemnness and regret. But don't tell that to Dave Gilbert, self-taught computer game programmer extraordinaire and founder of Wadjet Eye Games.

Dave Gilbert

The 31-year-old New Yorker has captured the imagination of Jewish and gentile videogamers in Canada and the U.S. with his breakout hit, The Shivah.

Released in August 2006, the game was born out of a local competition, the Monthly Adventure Game Studio (MAGS) competition, between programmers to see who could concoct the best video game inside of a month.

Gilbert, who had just returned from a year-long journey to Asia, was feeling happy to be home and back among Jews, and the idea to create a game based around a Jewish theme felt fitting.

"I was never very religious, but I noticed [the lack of Jews] in Asia," Gilbert told Heebonics/The CJN by phone from New York. "It was very weird. So when I came back... I had this idea in my head to do a detective game that didn't star an actual detective. I thought of different characters and the idea of having a rabbi do it really appealed to me."

The game itself is kind of a two-dimensional, lo-res, old-style affair, that harks back to a time of simpler, 1980s graphics. But it's charming and tightly written, with terrific voice-acting and jazzed-up sound effects. It might well have the distinction of being the first video game named after the Jewish ritual of mourning the dead.

In The Shivah, the player controls Rabbi Russell Stone, a frustrated, cynical and slightly bitter rabbi presiding over a dwindling congregation in Manhattan and on the verge of losing his synagogue to financial insolvency.

That's where the story picks up. Rabbi Stone receives a message saying one of his former congregants has passed away, leaving the rabbi a stack of cash.

Being the crusty-on-the-outside, good-hearted-on-the-inside rabbi that he is, Rabbi Stone refuses to just accept the money without first determining how and why the man who left him the money was killed.

The story arc takes the player all over pixilated Manhattan, questioning quirky characters and fending off suspicious New York police.

The game is a fun chance for Jews in North America to test their logic and morals, and for a certain demographic, to relive days spent in front of their Commodore 64s and Apple IIEs, playing video games with similar appeal.

It's been reviewed all over the place, including on popular websites such as The Onion, Adventuregamers.com and the indygamer blogspot.

"When I say the game's been successful... my games and [Wadjeteye] have been successful in every way but financially," Gilbert said with a laugh. "The fact that I was written up in The Onion... and all these mainstream places, has been a whirlwind. I was nominated for a Choice Award at the [2007] Game Developers Conference convention. A year ago I never would have thought I'd get this much publicity. I couldn't have asked for more. And it's still happening."

Gilbert also had the foresight to include a built-in Yiddish dictionary for players who might be confused with the game's many Yiddishisms.

And The Shivah is resonating particularly intensely with the Jewish community.

"I've seen reviews on [Jewish] blogs and newspapers," he said. "I've had rabbis e-mail me telling me the game was cool and also some complaining about the game. I was expecting that."

But Gilbert said he was most moved by a recent e-mail he received from a completely unexpected source.

"I once got an e-mail from an Israeli soldier telling me [his unit was] sitting around playing it wherever they were at the time. That just made my day," Gilbert said.

He isn't resting on his laurels either. After founding Wadjet Eye Games earlier this year to help him continue churning out video games, he's spent all his time since devoted to production on his latest creation, The Blackwell Legacy, another sleuthing game.

The Shivah is currently available for purchase online. A free demo version is also available.

WATCH FOR THE HEEBONICS LAUNCH

Gabi's Dresser to be presented at York U

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Following rave reviews and sold-out shows over the last few years, the acclaimed Holocaust drama The Secret of Gabi's Dresser will be featured on stage in Toronto throughout May.

In addition to a series of shows that will be seen by more than 9,000 students from across Toronto, a special community performance will be presented on May 20 at York University's Burton Auditorium.

"This show provides an opportunity for students from public schools to learn from the history of the Holocaust… and to make them aware [of intolerance] so they can be better citizens," said Helena Fine, the play's producer and the managing director with Te-Amim Music Theatre, which commissioned the production.

"We've also decided to have one performance for the public to make tolerance education accessible to everyone."

Inspired by a true story, the play is based on the eponymous novel by Kathy Kacer, whose real-life mother hid inside a dresser during the war in Czechoslovakia to elude the Nazis.

The play dramatically portrays the way in which Jews were singled out and separated from the rest of society and the impact it had on young Gabi and her family.

"Children and adults can identify with Gabi because they see how she was a happy child who had a lovely home and lots of love from her parents… and then lost her friends, her home and almost her life," Fine related.

"It's all about human rights and dignity."

Fine adds the play doesn't exclusively focus on Gabi's strife, but also sheds light on the Righteous Gentile who saved her.

To prepare students and teachers for the play, educational workshops organized in collaboration with the Toronto District School Board will be held.

After each performance, Holocaust survivors will briefly speak to the audiences about their wartime experiences, followed by a question and answer session.

"Often, we bring survivors who were children that hid during the war so there is a real connection [to the play]," said Fine.

The Secret of Gabi's Dresser stars Jill Morrison as Gabi, as well as Nadine Rabinovitch and Allan Price as her parents.

Friends is the sole sponsor of the production, which has been subsidized by Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies through its Tolerance Series for Public Schools in the GTA.

Tickets can be purchased by contacting 416-736-5888. For more information, visit www.te-amim.com.

Jewish Film Festival offers an eclectic selection

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's Toronto Jewish Film Festival is presenting, as usual, an eclectic selection of movies.

Hitler's Jewish Soldiers (Thursday, May 10 at 6 p.m.), based on Bryan Mark Rigg's book, Hitler's Jewish Warriors, is a fascinating account of a little-known phenomenon in Nazi Germany: the presence of mixed-race Jews, or mischlings, in the armed forces.

After the passage of the 1935 Nuremberg laws, which disenfranchised German Jews and categorized citizens along racial lines, full Jews were summarily dismissed from the army. Jews of partial Christian ancestry, however, were permitted to serve. According to Rigg, the Wehrmacht drafted 60,000 half-Jews, including Werner Goldberg, who appeared on a recruiting poster as an "ideal Aryan."

Werner Goldberg

Such jarring anomalies were eliminated in 1940 when half-Jews like Goldberg were thrown out of the army. "You are not Aryan," he was told brusquely. But due to manpower shortages, half-Jews were recalled in 1943.

Helmut Kopp, who was halachically Jewish and circumcised, was in a panzer tank unit. Though he passed as a Christian, he always feared that he would be "outed." He survived by remaining in the army, and was a prisoner of war after being captured on the Russian front. Arno Spitz, who came from a converted Jewish family, was a thrice-decorated paratrooper. Hans Geert Falkenberg stayed in Germany after his parents left the country, and was reunited with his Jewish grandmother in Poland. Ephraim Glaser, a Hungarian Jew who was an interpreter in the German army for five months, is also profiled.

In passing, Price mentions other Christians of Jewish descent in Hitler's army – Col. Ernst Bloch, who rescued the Lubavitcher rebbe; Gen. Erhard Milch, Hermann Goring's right-hand man, and Helmut Schmidt, a future chancellor of Germany whose grandfather was Jewish.

Eran Torbiner's Madrid Before Hanita (May 10 at 8 p.m.) concerns the 300 Palestinian Jews who volunteered for the International Brigades during the 1936-39 Spanish Civil War. This conflict, which pitted the legitimately elected government against the conservative nationalist forces of Francisco Franco, brought 40,000 volunteers from around the world to Spain who fought on the side of the Soviet-backed Second Spanish Republic. Of the 40,000, 10,000 were Jews, says Torbiner in this interesting documentary, which consists of file footage and contemporary interviews.

The Jews from Palestine who went to Spain, usually via France, were animated by one overarching motive. They regarded the war as a struggle against fascism, since the nationalists were supported by Germany and Italy. "It was the right placed to be," says one of the Palestinian Jewish fighters.

The majority appear to have been Communists or Communist sympathizers, but some were Zionists. One volunteer was ejected from his kibbutz when he declared his intentions. Decades later, he rose to be deputy director of the Mossad, Israel's secret service.

The reminiscences of the volunteers range far and wide. One man recalls being caught in the Italian bombardment of Barcelona. A second one remembers charging up a hill in an unsuccessful attack. A third person tells of nearly being crushed by a tank rumbling over his trench. A fourth individual speaks of a red-haired friend who was vapourized by a bomb.

Clearly, they paid heavily for their valour. Seventy of the Palestinian Jews, and 10,000 of the other volunteers, fell in combat. Torbiner distills the essence of their passion for a sacred but ultimately futile cause.

Miss Universe 1929 (May 10 at noon), by Hungarian filmmaker Peter Forgacs, focuses on Lisl Goldarbeiter, a lovely and graceful Viennese Jewish woman with dark flowing hair and an infectious smile who was crowned Miss Austria and then Miss Universe. Born in 1909, she hailed from a family of modest circumstances. When she entered her first beauty contest, she was working in her father's leather goods shop.

She was an old-fashioned girl who, after placing second in a Paris beauty pageant, said in accented English, "I'm a Viennese, and my greatest ambition is to marry and have a home."

After becoming Miss Universe in Galveston, Tex., King Vidor, a Hollywood director, offered her a contract if she improved her English, but nothing came of the offer. Courted by a succession of suitors, she married the wealthy playboy Fritz Spielmann, much to the disappointment of an ardent Hungarian admirer named Marci, who appears on screen both as a young and old man.

Shortly after Austria was annexed by Germany in 1938, Lisl's father was severely beaten by Nazi thugs, prompting her parents to move to Szeged, Hungary, where they had relatives. Forgacs says that Spielmann found refuge in Shanghai, China, but lets it go at that, never explaining why Lisl did not join him there. Lisl and her parents survived the Nazi occupation on forged Aryan papers. After the war, Lisl married Marci, and they lived happily ever after in Hungary. "Never a more beautiful woman has walked the earth, neither before or after," he says fulsomely.

Miss Universe 1929, an ode to the power of love that features the alluring Lisl in various situations and poses, unfortunately unfolds at a snail's pace and a muffled narration punctuated by incomprehensible whispering.

By one estimate, Latin America is home to 18 million Catholics whose ancestors were forced to convert to Christianity after the Spanish Inquisition. Gabrielle Bohm's The Longing: The Forgotten Jews of South America (May 10 at 1 p.m.) is about six of their descendants who, in an incredible leap of faith, return to their ancestral roots.

Bohm's heartfelt film, which was shot on location in Colombia and Ecuador, places their quest in context, with a Brazilian scholar explaining that "historical memory" and the maintenance of certain customs kept the flames of Judaism burning among some of the crypto-Jewish families.

The Longing turns on a Spanish-speaking Reform rabbi from the United States who takes it upon himself to convert these Christians to Judaism in the face of opposition from the established Jewish community. After her conversion, a convert says, "It's the nicest thing that could have happened to me." What an understatement.

Gary Beitel's Chez Schwartz (May 10 at 5:15 p.m.), a nostalgic tribute to a Montreal deli and institution, is frankly disappointing.

The camera pans on satisfied customers munching scrumptious sandwiches, workers talking about themselves and their respective jobs and eccentric neighbourhood characters. Fine and well. But the film tends to be annoyingly repetitive and often sounds like an extended paid ad. Worse still, in Beitel's telling, the history of Schwartz's is mostly a blank. Too bad. He missed a chance to tell a rousing story.

CONCERT WAS A 'FREILICH FROLIC' THROUGH HISTORY OF YIDDISH THEATRE MUSIC

Last week's sold-out concert at Beth Tzedec – 100 Years of Yiddish Theatre Music, with Zalmen Mlotek and Joanne Borts – was a "freilich frolic" through a century's worth of musical treasures.

Mlotek's archival explorations in search of forgotten show tunes from the heyday of the Yiddish theatre has produced a rich vein of material, which he and Borts performed with charisma and boundless energy. All that was lacking was an orchestra to re-create the original orchestrations, but Mlotek's piano accompaniment served in good stead.

Kudos to the Kasrilevke Committee for supporting these ongoing efforts to revitalize our Yiddish theatrical heritage. We're looking forward to next year's event.

Names in the News: Trying, a play by Saskatoon-born playwright Joanna McClelland Glass, opened recently at the Centaur Theatre in Montreal. Set in 1967, the play is about the relationship between Francis Biddle, attorney general in the Franklin D. Roosevelt administration and former judge during the Nuremberg trials, and his new secretary, a young woman from the Canadian prairies eager to become a writer.

The story is autobiographical, since Glass herself worked for Biddle in the last year of his life after moving to Washington with her new husband. The play premièred in New York in 2004 and has since been seen in Chicago, Ottawa, Toronto and other cities, generally to glowing reviews.

Her numerous plays have been produced all over the world. She has also written two novels, Reflections on a Mountain Summer and Woman Wanted, which was adapted to film. An American citizen since 1962, she lives in Chicago.

More Names in the News: A production crew from the National Film Board and Montreal film producers Garry Beitel and Barry Lazar left recently for a "klezmer cruise" on the Dnieper River in Ukraine with musician Josh Dolgin and about 150 klez aficionados. Beitel, Lazar and the NFB are preparing to make a documentary on Dolgin. For concert footage from the Ukraine and a blog on the production, visit www.socalledmusic.com.

Passages: Kitty Carlisle Hart, best remembered for her years as a panellist on the TV game show To Tell the Truth, died in New York City on April 17, at the age of 96.

Hart had a long performing career that extended until only a few months ago, when she performed her one-woman musical show Here's to Life in Atlanta and afterward suffered a bout of pneumonia. Her film career stretched over more than six decades and included roles in the classic Marx Brothers' film A Night at the Opera (1935) and Six Degrees of Separation (1993).

Born as Catherine Conn in Louisiana in 1910, she was married to playwright-director Moss Hart, who died in 1961. Afterward she added "Hart" to the stage name she had used since making her Broadway debut in 1933.

Known as a charmer, she was once asked for advice on how to be charming. "It's simple," she replied. "When someone enters a room, you say, 'What is it that would make them comfortable? What would they like to have? What would they like to hear?' And that's it."

Abigail Pogrebin recently wrote in the Forward that she felt lucky to include Hart in Stars of David, her book about Jewish celebrities, because Hart usually kept quiet about her Judaism. "You know, I came out in this book," Hart admitted to Pogrebin's sister.

Reviewer Steven Winn reported last year that the nonagenarian trouper was still getting mileage out of her famously good legs. "Early on in Wednesday's opening-night performance of her cabaret show, Here's to Life, the oldest working woman in show business recalled the black tights she wore in the 1933 show Champagne Sec," Winn wrote in the San Francisco Chronicle. "Then, with an approving glance downward, Hart collapsed seven decades in a twinkling. A packed house at the Empire Plush Room eagerly took the cue and cheered. Her gams, to this adoring crowd, looked as great as ever."

Israeli quilt artist exhibits at Columbus Centre

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

In the past, quilts were popularized in many different cultures and were used mainly as blankets and dresses.

"Patterns, colours and materials varied according to time and place," she says. "Traditional quilts were made of small pieces of fabric, which were hand sewn together into repetitive and geometric patterns forming one large mantle."

But in recent years, she notes, the making of quilts has evolved into an art. The quilts she makes are primarily intended for wall hangings.

She says that some traditional materials, techniques and motifs are still being used in creating the art quilt, "but there are many new and innovative approaches being incorporated, such as the use of paper, photo transfer, and silk, with total freedom in size and shape for all the pieces which form the quilt."

Covo was born in Bulgaria and immigrated to Israel as a child in 1948, after the War of Independence. She lives in Ramat HaSharon with her husband Shlomo, a dentist. They have three daughters and five grandchildren.

She said she has fond memories of living in Toronto for two years. "I wanted to exhibit in Toronto because 37 years ago, Shlomo attended a post-graduate program for two years in orthodontics at the dental faculty at the University of Toronto."

He was the first Israeli to be admitted into a post-graduate course at the school.

The quilts in her exhibit are inspired by Israeli landscape and reflect her personal interpretation of the evolving tradition of quilt making, Covo says. She has worked for seven years to create the exhibition.

Covo has enjoyed working with her hands since she was a child, she says. "One day, about eight or nine years ago, I went to buy material for a costume for my granddaughter. The storekeeper told me that a woman from the textile college was going to come to teach patchwork and quilting.

"I took the course and I realized that I had finally found what I had been looking for – it combines all the things I enjoy working with and it brought together everything I had been studying for years."

She has degrees in physical education, Hebrew literature and education, and the history of art. She also studied at the College of Technology and Textiles in Ramat Gan.

Covo has exhibited in Israel, the Netherlands, England, Spain, France and the United States. On a previous visit to Toronto, she took a sample of her work to the gallery at the Columbus Centre.

"It took the curator at the museum all of two minutes to say that they would book me. One of the stipulations by the gallery was that it would be an exhibition and a sale," she says. "Throughout the years, I never wanted to sell my art quilts because it was the love of doing the art. But I agreed."

A perpetual student who continues to take courses, she is a member of the Israeli Quilt Association, Israeli Arts and Crafts Association and the International Quilt Association.

She adds that she is grateful to dentists Sidney Golden and Earl Holtrecht, who hung her quilts in the gallery, "and the many others, like Nancy Golden, who made this exhibition possible."

One of her art quilts will be donated to Alpha Omega Dental Fraternity. The fraternity will donate it to Baycrest.

Reading circle creates anthology of Yiddish women's writing

Arguing with the Storm: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers,* edited By Rhea Tregebov, Sumach Press.

By NORMAN RAVVIN

Arguing with the Storm: Stories by Yiddish Women Writers reflects important grassroots phenomena in Canadian literary life. Editor Rhea Tregebov explains in her introduction how a women's reading circle in Winnipeg, dedicated to the work of both little-known and well-known Yiddish women writers, transformed itself into an editorial and translating collective with the goal of creating an anthology.

Norman Ravvin

The accomplishment of the Winnipeg Women's Yiddish Reading Circle reflects a continuing interest in Yiddish; the popularity of "life writing" as a source of self-reflection; and the influence of women's reading and study groups on literary taste.

The stories translated into English for Arguing with the Storm reflect a variety of Jewish female experience, whether from prewar eastern Europe or postwar North America. The Holocaust exists in these pieces as a kind of dividing line – it represents the event that transformed many of the writers' lives.

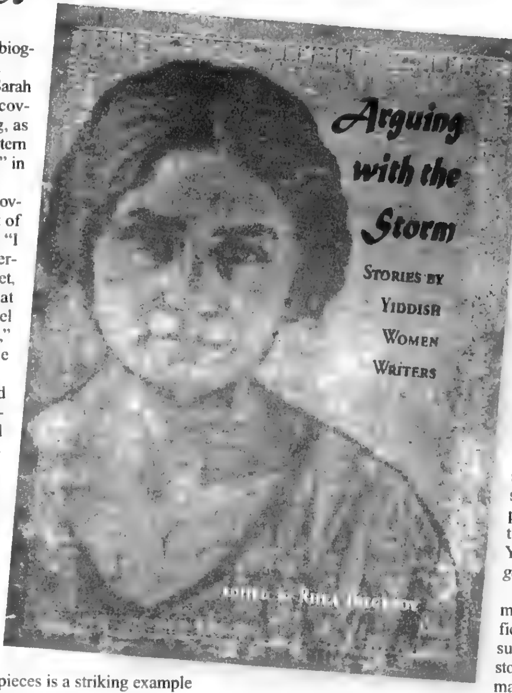
Yet the stories themselves tend to focus on more basic kinds of experience: women's work, family responsibilities, or such transformative experiences as the politicization of Russian Jewish youth at the turn of the 20th century.

A number of the stories in Arguing with the Storm reflect a period in Yiddish literary culture when a published story or tale – what we think of today as a work of fiction – was likely to be rooted in a mixture of autobiography, memoir and ethnography.

We are offered, in pieces by Sarah Hamer-Jacklyn and Bryna Bercovitch, a form of memory writing, as the authors' memories of their eastern European homes are "recovered" in often emotional prose.

"No, it really happened," Bercovitch tells the reader at the outset of her Becoming a Revolutionary. "I remember, first, a small, impoverished house on Kuznyetchna Street, in the town of Cherson." What follows is the curious tale of Yankel the shochet, "a secret socialist," whose energy is dedicated to the revolution.

In the case of Bercovitch and Anne Viderman, their reminiscences were originally published as columns written for the Montreal Yiddish daily Der kanader adler. Viderman's A Fiddle includes two early columns for the newspaper, one of which describes an awkward meeting on Montreal's Fletcher's Field between the narrator and a "group of French-speaking boys and girls" who are surprised to hear a Jewish girl play Russian folk songs on the fiddle.



Alongside these memoiristic pieces is a striking example of what was considered to be writing for young readers in the 1920s. This is Malka Lee's The Apple of Her Eye, whose distinctly New York opening is: "The apple of her eye first came into the world in a dark basement below the El. The racket of trains drowned out his first cry."

The final story included in the collection, Chava Rosenfarb's Letters to God, stands out as something different from the rest of the book's contents. It is a straightforward short story, highly stylized, which appeared in 1995 in the influential Yiddish journal Di goldene keyt.

Its characters, like many in Rosenfarb's fiction, are Holocaust survivors. But the story rests on the intimate relationship between a busy city doctor and his dying father. "I remember how triumphant you were," the son muses, "when I decided to give in to you and become practical. I embarked on the study of medicine. How proud you were when I received my medical diploma! You even accepted with good cheer my specializing in psychiatry. That was my compromise choice. I told myself that psychiatry, like poetry, tackles the mystery of the human soul and heals its wounds in its own way."

In her introduction, Tregebov refers to Rosenfarb as "a national literary treasure" whose work has contributed "to the renaissance of Yiddish literature, a movement that began to gain real momentum in 1980 with the establishment of the National Yiddish Book Center in Amherst, Mass."

The editorial care applied to the contributors' work in Arguing with the Storm is reflected by the detailed introductions that precede each writer's work. These place the authors in their historical and writerly context, offer biographical and bibliographical detail, and include an author photo. They are effective at conveying the challenges in each writer's life, whether from forced immigration, the demands of raising a family, or the vagaries of Yiddish publishing in a century full of catastrophe.

This latter concern is strikingly present in the biography of Rochel Broches, a prolific Minsk-born writer, whose "collected works, containing over 200 short stories… was being prepared for publication by the State Publishing House of White Russia when the Germans invaded the Soviet Union in 1941. The book was never issued."

Included in Arguing with the Storm is Broches' Little Abrahams, a contribution to a genre that might be called the Yiddish grotesque, which offers a unique literary investigation of the concept of a mamzer in prewar eastern Europe.

Norman Ravvin's most recent novel, Lola by Night, is due out in Serbian translation later in the year. His other books include Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue and A House of Words: Jewish Writing, Identity and Memory. He is chair of the Concordia University Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Rare skin disease prevalent in Ashkenazi Jews

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Vardit Zafri is currently fighting a disease called pemphigus vulgaris, which very few of us have ever heard of. And even most doctors only encounter one or two cases in their professional life, said Sunnybrook Health Sciences dermatologist Dr. Scott Walsh.

Pemphigus Vulgaris (PV) is an autoimmune disease in which the body attacks a protein that keeps the cells of the skin together.

The effect can be devastating. Walsh explained that it can lead to blistering of the mucosa and skin, from the mouth to the esophagus and all the way up to the nose. The skin may peel off, and Walsh said that patients with PV are sometimes sent to burn units, where doctors try to replace the layers of skin.

Red, blistered patches can spring up anywhere on the body. In a severe case, these patches can cover so much of the body that they literally suffocate the skin, causing death.

PV can also cause death from malnutrition if the disease destroys the ability to eat, or from secondary infections, he said.

Right now, the only treatment is prednisone, an anabolic steroid that suppresses the immune system. The problem is that prednisone itself has serious side effects, especially with long-term use. And those with PV have to take it for the rest of their lives.

No one knows what causes PV, Walsh said, although "it appears that it is a combination of environmental factors [although no one knows what those factors are] and a genetic component."

While the disease is extremely rare in the general population, with an incidence of only one to five cases per million of population, it is more prevalent in Southeast Asians, those from the Middle East and Ashkenazi Jews. A study from Jerusalem showed an incidence of one to two per 100,000 population.

Zafri said that six months ago she had never heard of pemphigus vulgaris either. That is when she discovered a small round patch of raised skin, which looked almost like a rash.

Fearing that she had skin cancer, which her mother had had, she sought treatment, eventually going to Walsh. A biopsy diagnosed PV.

"I was shocked," she said. "It sounded like a sexually transmitted disease."

Fortunately, Zafri has a mild case. Still, she has been taking prednisone and Imuran regularly. The side effects have led to weight gain and swollen legs, swollen badly enough that walking is difficult.

She said that she is not depressed, as one might expect her to be. "I'm scared. I have no immune system left. How long can I survive on drugs?"

Zafri says there is an urgent need to develop new drugs with fewer side effects and a need for research into the causes and possible treatments of PV. "I would like to see a research foundation here in Toronto," she said.

Walsh noted that a recent study in Israel showed that with long-term therapy, the disease can go into remission.

For the first time, the annual meeting of the International Pemphigus Vulgaris Foundation will be held outside the United States. This year, it takes place in Toronto, on July 28, and the focus will be on research into treatment, Walsh said.

Survivors found to be 'very resilient'

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

New research by Haifa University developmental psychologist Avi Sagi-Schwartz and his colleagues has exploded the commonly held belief that Holocaust survivors transmit their traumas to their children and grandchildren.

The findings show that survivors are "very resilient and adaptive," even after enduring terrible disasters, he said in an e-mail interview from Haifa.

Sagi-Schwartz, whose mother is a survivor, found that the offsprings of survivors exhibit "the same normative behaviours" as children whose parents were not traumatized by the Holocaust.

He acknowledged that most mental health professionals claim that the traumas of survivors trickle down to their children, who in turn transmit them to their sons and daughters.

But in his research – conducted with fellow psychologists from Israel, Germany and Holland starting in 1995 – he discovered that this perception was simply untrue.

Sagi-Schwartz, director of Haifa University's Center for the Study of Child Development, said that the success survivors have generally enjoyed in Israel prompted him to embark on the project.

He had the sense that survivors made the best of their difficulties, despite the problems they encountered in their new homes.

She went into hiding in France and Belgium at the age of 14 after her parents were shipped to Auschwitz and murdered there. She arrived in Palestine in 1945, not knowing anyone or speaking a single word of Hebrew.

"After all these atrocities and hardships, my mother managed to build a new life. How this could happen, given theories and beliefs about traumatized survivors, was one more motivating factor in my decision to study the topic."

Born in pre-state Israel in 1947, Sagi-Schwartz joined forces with other researchers, including Klaus and Karin Grossmann and Marinus van Ijzendoorn, in an attempt to determine whether Holocaust traumas were transmitted to the next generation.

He and his colleagues have published their findings in the American Journal of Psychiatry and the Journal of Traumatic Stress and in a book, Childhood in the Shadow of the Holocaust, published in Hebrew by Hakibbutz Hameuchad Press.

Sagi-Schwartz, whose research has been supported by the Ford Foundation and the Israel Academy of Science, said he will not be surprised if his findings are disputed.

"We know that people working in the field who are used to old theories and popular beliefs will have difficulty accepting our conclusions. But additional research done in other parts of the world have yielded similar results."

After evaluating studies on Holocaust trauma from the United States, Canada, Britain and Israel and comparing them with his own study, he found that the results were similar.

"One of the problems was that, in many cases, researchers recruited participants from organizations that help survivors in distress. This meant that a very specific cross-section of survivors who took part in the study suffered from a high level of distress. This was not representative of the general population of survivors and, therefore, led to biased conclusions."

Sagi-Schwartz suggested that survivors who did not pass on their traumas had normal family lives and "supportive environments" before World War II.

They were thus able to shelve their traumas, call on their reserves of stamina and resilience, and resume normal lives after the war.

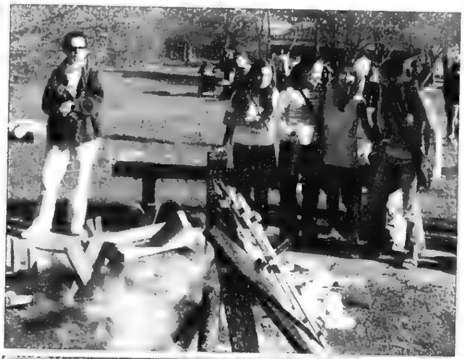
Habonim Dror celebrates



Habonim Dror Camp Gesher had their traditional Lab B'Omer bonfire and BBQ on May 6. The wonderful weather and plenty of good solid wood, provided the perfect setting for this event. After sitting around the bonfire and learning about Lag b'Omer from three of its main characters, Rabbi Akiva, Rabbi Shimon Bar Yochai and Bar Kochba, played by the counsellors, the time was ready for some real practice in bow and arrows.

STREET NAMING

About 3,000 people attended Sunday night's ceremony and street festival that named a new street in memory of Israel's first astronaut Ilan Ramon, who died in 2003 in the Columbia space shuttle disaster. The road runs adjacent to UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, a 50-acre site along Bathurst Street north of Rutherford Road in Vaughan. CFL's new commish has lots on his plate

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Unlike his predecessors Tom Wright, Mike Lysko, John Tory and Larry Smith, he's not facing fires that have to be put out, and put out now. He's got a five-year contract in his pocket, suggesting support from the league's often contentious governors, and thanks to the multi-year deal, he's not immediately under the gun.

Instead, Cohon's got the time to think strategically and implement his vision for the league. And what he's talking about only a few weeks into the job is growing league revenue, strengthening the relationship with corporate Canada and increasing the league's profile among the next generation of football fans.

It's all sunshine and blue skies right now, even though the league has been plagued in recent years with financial instability, faltering franchises, a U.S. expansion that flopped and a salary management system that many teams ignore.

Mark Cohon

A fast talker of no mean skill, Cohon the younger believes "the league is in good shape right now. We're in a building mode. We're engaging youth."

There was a time that the league had lost its cachet among young people, but that appears to be reversing, he said. The success of the Alouettes in Montreal has led to a phenomenal growth in young men playing football in Quebec – from 3,000 to 35,000 – and he sees no reason that success can't be duplicated elsewhere.

The league will partner with ParticipACTION, a federal fitness awareness program, to get kids more active. It will hold mini-camps for high school players, and Cohon believes the opportunities for marketing the game to young people are endless.

Growing the league demographic is one thing; expanding to new cities is another, and several Canadian cities are currently on the league's radar.

Cohon believes Ottawa may get a team again if the proper ownership group can be found. He acknowledges that in the past "the fans were burned" by owners who abandoned the franchise and this time, before any deals are signed, the league will "take time to find a [ownership] group committed in the long term."

The worst-case scenario would be to "rush back and have challenges in a couple of years."

Cohon said he is open to exploring other expansion sites, but it's early in the game and the league has not begun to do its homework in finding suitable candidates. However, he suggested that cities such as Halifax, Quebec City and perhaps even the Kitchener/Waterloo/London area could be considered.

Cohon said he would work with league governors and players to craft a drug policy that would address performance enhancing drugs, as well as the recreational variety. Currently the league has no such policy.

Toronto's infatuation with the NFL doesn't faze him, though he admits the league to the south is "a juggernaut" that attracts young people.

Still, the CFL has partnered with the NFL to develop programs for young people, and renegotiating that deal is certainly a priority.

The Argos, he said, have a solid core of followers and under the ownership of David Cynamon and Howard Sokolowski the team's profile has increased. It can only get better with the excitement that will be generated by the Grey Cup in Toronto later this season, he said.

At any rate, the league can't get too Toronto-centric, he continued. In recent weeks, Cohon has visited franchises in Winnipeg and Regina, and he marvels at the devotion fans in Saskatchewan show to their Roughriders.

Cohon, too, is a fan of the CFL. "I love the game. I think it's a great part of the Canadian identity," he said.

Cohon comes to the CFL after 15 years in sports marketing, sponsorship and business development. He's served in various executive positions at Major League Baseball and the National Basketball Association (NBA). He worked as the NBA's director and group manager of international marketing as well as marketing director of NBA Europe and vice-president of business development.

"I think it prepared me for the [CFL] job," he said.

While working for the NBA in Europe, he travelled to Israel frequently to negotiate the league's local television rights, license its products and build grass roots support – sort of like what he's expected to do for the CFL.

Cohon estimates he's visited Israel 15 to 20 times. "I feel when I land at Ben Gurion Airport, [I'm] at home, in a spiritual way."

In addition to his sporting endeavours, Cohon serves as chair of the Ontario Science Centre and is a member of the board of Katimavik, a youth services organization. He's a member of Holy Blossom Temple and he spoke recently at a UJA Federation of Greater Toronto panel discussion on sports and philanthropy that included Cynamon, Maple Leaf Sports and Entertainment chair Lawrence Tanenbaum and Toronto Blue Jays president Paul Godfrey.

Israeli juniors go 1-4 in IIHF tournament

Israel's under-18 junior hockey team avoided relegation to the International Ice Hockey Federation's entry level division with a 1-4 record at a tournament in Hungary recently.

Israel will return to the IIHF's Division II next year, thanks to a 5-3 victory over lowly Mexico. With a 0-5 record, Mexico was relegated to Division III while the Netherlands, undefeated at 5-0, will advance to Division I.

Israel was badly outscored in the tournament, with the Mexico game and an opening 5-2 loss to Belgium the only close contests. The Israelis lost to the Netherlands 7-1, Hungary 12-3 and Estonia 9-0.

It could have been worse without solid work between the pipes. Israeli Eden Nemenoff was named top goaltender in the tournament.

Daniel Erlich was Israel's leading scorer – 10th best in the tournament – with nine points on five goals and four assists.

Who's in charge?

By MICHAEL GORDON

It was another call about a family conflict with the health care team.

A daughter was saying, "I want my mother to get all treatments available, no matter what you think. She is my mother and since I am her substitute decision maker [SDM], I am legally in charge."

The Senior Side of Life

The staff asked my ethicist colleague and me to intervene, because they thought the daughter's treatment requests were unreasonable, and it wasn't clear whether they were what the mother would have wanted had she been able to express herself.

Why would health care professionals feel that way about the request of a daughter acting as an SDM? Did the staff know something about what was best for the patient that the daughter didn't, or was the daughter requesting medical interventions that were excessive under the circumstances?

A team meeting with the ethicist revealed that some time in the past, another daughter who was not the SDM indicated to the unit's social worker that her mother would never have wanted to be kept alive with a feeding tube in a state of semi-consciousness. This comment was made some months after a feeding tube had been inserted at the request of the SDM daughter because of inadequate nutritional intake.

The staff, during their discussions with the SDM daughter, assumed that she was making the feeding tube decision based on her mother's wishes and values. It was only after the second daughter, who was estranged from her sister, suggested that the SDM daughter was not acting properly that the staff became concerned about the SDM daughter's decisions.

The health care team arranged a meeting with the SDM daughter and asked her how she came to her decision about her mother's feeding tube. She bristled at the question and answered, "I am not sure what my mother would have wanted. She was a very proud person and valued life to the fullest. She was upset that her sister had languished in a hospital in Montreal for a few years with a feeding tube. But she did not say for sure that she would never want this for herself – at least not specifically. We didn't talk about such dreadful things."

At the followup team meeting with the two ethicists, the SDM daughter's primary concern appeared to be about the potential threat to her decision-making capacity. She asserted that she "was in charge" and that if we challenged her, she would "take legal action" and make sure she got her "rightful and legal way."

The question for the whole team was whether it was worth challenging the SDM daughter's decisions because of their doubts that she was acting as her mother would have wanted. The basis of the SDM daughter's decisions were not completely clear, and the issue was clouded and confounded by the estrangement of the sisters.

SDMs must know that their legal mandate is to make decisions that represent the person for whom they are acting, not as they, the SDMs, wish.

The legal basis is what the SDM believes to be what the person would have wanted if they could express themselves. This could be based on written directives (advance directives or living wills) or discussions in which the topic was addressed.

If an SDM is acting otherwise, health care professionals can challenge his or her role through mechanisms such as Ontario's Consent and Capacity Board and can request to have the person removed from their decision-making role.

SDMs must be certain that they are acting properly, for the sake of the person they are representing, and also that they legally fulfil the requirements of a role that is considered a most honourable and important one.

The sources that unite us

Epi on Education

Recently, I was copied on an e-mail exchange that illustrated the essential value of Jewish literacy. A lay leader and a senior member of my staff were involved in an intense dialogue about a rather serious issue. While I can't reveal the actual topic, the issues that came into play were feminism, Orthodox halachic sources, and pluralism – heavy material.

Seymour Epstein

At first, the two people seemed to be of opposite opinions. As I read more of the exchange, however, I saw that, although there were differences, their respective positions were closer than I had originally thought.

Indeed, it was the content and process of the debate itself that brought the two of them closer. How? As they cited one classical source after another, along with their individual interpretations of those sources, two things happened. Firstly, they (and I) noted how the sources unified them. These same sources have been our inspiration for law and lore over centuries, and they have kept us together more than they have separated us. Secondly, their mutual command of the sources engendered mutual respect, even if the sides differed on interpretation.

This was yet another illustration of the essential need for Jewish literacy in order to have intelligent intercourse about our traditions – past, present, and future.

But the twist was that I learned a new/old lesson about literacy. A professor of mine once explained that the famous teaching of the Talmud, "Torah scholars increase peace in the world," was a bit of talmudic humour. But, I have come to see that, in fact, deep scholarship has the potential for increasing peace. The dynamic of give and take around a unifying text often leads to synthesis and agreement, but even disagreement demands Buberian mutuality – the ability to look the other in the eye and understand that he or she owns an equally empowering opinion.

I would guess that that is what the rabbis meant by "an argument for the sake of heaven."

An apology that's long overdue

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

The following official court notice appeared in local newspapers recently: "The Indian residential schools settlement has been approved. The healing continues."

URBAN WRITER

The court order states that $1.9 billion be given to native people who suffered in residential schools. Up to $275,000 per person will go to individuals based on the amount of sexual, physical and psychological abuse they suffered; $125 million has been set aside for "healing"; $60 million is earmarked for "research" and preserving the experiences of the survivors; and $20 million will go to national and community commemorative projects.

If you've never read about Canada's residential schools, Google "native residential schools Canada" and learn that children were pulled from the arms of their parents as part of religious missionary work and taken to one of 72 residential schools across Canada. The last schools closed in 1996.

In these unsanitary schools, children were punished for speaking their language and forced to sleep next to youngsters dying of tuberculosis (of whom thousands were buried in unmarked graves).

The $1.9 billion that has been earmarked to pay for this genocide – the UN Convention on the Prevention and Punishment of the Crime of Genocide says the forcible transfer of children from one group to another is an act of genocide if done "with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group" – is long overdue and far too little.

If it's possible to quantify the value of a child, whether that child died in St. Philip Residential School or Duck Lake boarding school (where it is said that more than one half of the children sent there died before their 18th birthdays), $1.9 billion does not cover one single native son or daughter who died at the hands of nuns, priests, government officials and those sworn to protect us, the RCMP.

Over the next year, survivors of the residential schools or their family members will make claims for the suffering they endured. Those who present appropriate evidence will one day receive a cheque in the mail. They will open the envelope, remove the cheque and likely stare at it for a long time – the same way, I imagine, Jewish Holocaust survivors do when they hold a German government cheque in their hand.

The amount of the cheque or the simple fact they were granted financial compensation, will not, however, be sufficient to give them closure.

To achieve that will require thorough and ongoing education for people like you and me that reveals the anguish our native people have gone through. Our schools need to bare the Canadian soul by teaching the real history of Canada, including the nasty policies of corporations that committed unspeakable crimes against native Canadians.

To find closure, a government cheque will not suffice. The prime minister of Canada must involve our entire country in a truth and reconciliation process so, we, the children and grandchildren of those who perpetrated this national crime, are encouraged to beg forgiveness from native survivors, and from those who died and will never have a voice.

He must speak to the entire nation, on prime time television, and say: "We can never properly repay those who lost their lives in Canadian residential schools. We will never be able to return children to their mother's arms who died in those horrific places. The Canadian people will forever live with this aspect of our history. However, today we beg you for forgiveness."

How is it possible that in our country, one with "glowing hearts," the most vulnerable among us – our children – were treated by the Anglican, Catholic and United churches like the enemy? How do we come to grips with the fact our government for decades ignored report after report that death tolls in some of these schools had reached 69 per cent?

To our children, our Aboriginal children, we say: "We are deeply sorry."

A place that speaks of hope

Editorial Feature

It is a phenomenon to behold. People come from around the world to stand before the large, imposing antiquity that we call the Western Wall.

Not all who are there pray. But invariably, most do touch the massive stones, fingers lingering on the smooth-surfaced blocks hewn from nearby quarries by unknown craftsmen more than 2,000 years ago.

And most leave behind small notes stuffed into the cracks and crevices of those blocks that carry in the secret code of the heart their most urgent pleas to a God Whom they need to be receptive and close at hand.

Even skeptics and rationalists have been known to acknowledge that there is a certain power in the experience. At its most mysterious, it can evoke the shudder of a beautiful moment that all of us know and try to hold onto, bittersweet against the passing of time.

In its essence, the experience is one of hope. Perhaps it is this feeling and all the possibilities and dreams that travel with hope that the stones communicate to us.

But the mail was not always deliverable.

Between 1948 and 1967, access to the Old City, to the Wall, was forbidden to the Jews. The Jews were expelled from the Jewish Quarter during the fighting in the War of Independence by the army of Transjordan. Their homes and synagogues in the quarter were destroyed. Barbed wire and concrete blocks divided the Old City from the new.

In June 1967, the Jews returned to the Old City. The story of the war and of the city's reunification is now part of the miracle of Jewish history.

This year we commemorate the 40th anniversary of the city's reunification. And this supplement is intended to share with readers some information and insight into how the city is growing today.

In particular, we feature the work of the Jerusalem Foundation. Established 40 years ago by the late Teddy Kollek, it is dedicated to building and developing the city in the widest sense and for the widest good.

Thus, there are feature stories dealing with education of children from Jerusalem and abroad, art, culture, history, neighbourhoods and various new movements for social and other change that are rising among the new generation of Israelis.

In one story, a first-time visitor writes movingly of his experiences in the city and of how he was "unprepared" for his first visit to the Wall.

We hope you will take as much delight in this supplement as we had in presenting it to you.

The 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem is a profoundly important moment in modern Jewish life, and indeed, in world history.

Let us all celebrate the day when it arrives next week on the 28th day of Iyar (May 16) and thank God – without the need of a letter addressed to the Wall – that He has brought us to this wonderful day.

A woman and a city

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

The city has a downtown street named for her great-grandfather and a major pharmaceutical industry founded by her grandfather, and her husband served as a Supreme Court justice for 14 years. Despite the vigorous involvement of her family in Jerusalem, however, Ruth Cheshin's many contributions to the city of her birth are uniquely her own.

"My grandfather was head of Palestine's Jewish community under the British Mandate, and we regularly hosted people from Jerusalem's different ethnic and religious groups," says Cheshin, whose family has lived in the city for seven generations. "I grew up with the awareness that many communities call Jerusalem their home."

It is this awareness and tolerance that has influenced Cheshin's leadership of the Jerusalem Foundation, which she helped create and has led for more than 40 years — and for which she was honoured on Israel's 59th Independence Day by being chosen to light one of the 12 beacons on Jerusalem's Mount Herzl.

"It was the foundation that was honoured, not me," she protests. But, since Cheshin and the foundation are hard to separate, it's fair to say they shared the honour.

It's for the sake of the Jerusalem Foundation that she agrees to an interview. "I'm usually reluctant to give time to interviews," she says, "but promoting the foundation is important. The better it's known, the more help it will attract, and the more forcefully it will push Jerusalem's needs to the forefront."

It was in 1966 that Cheshin was pulled out of Jerusalem's Tourism Department by the city's newly elected mayor, Teddy Kollek, to help establish a committee to work for the welfare of all Jerusalem's residents and thus bolster the urban backwater that was the capital of Israel, the centre of the Jewish people, and the focus of the faiths.

She and Kollek had already worked together: in the early 1960s, when she returned from study-leave in London with her husband, the future Supreme Court Justice Mishael Cheshin, and their infant daughter Efrat, eldest of their three children, she and Jerusalem's future mayor had set up the City of Jerusalem's Tourism Department. Now they ushered the Jerusalem Foundation into the world.

Months later, however, Jerusalem and, with it, the foundation's role were to be transformed. In June 1967, the Six Day War was fought and won, and Jerusalem, then "the city at the end of the world," in Cheshin's words, found itself reunited, in the global spotlight and poised for exponential growth.

"Jerusalem in the mid-1960s was an arid, dusty town, perched on the edge of the desert," says Cheshin. "We saw the foundation's role in those early days as turning the city green. We wanted to provide outdoor space for the many families living in small, cramped apartments, and at the same time make the city beautiful. We believed that everyone entering it should ponder its beauty and feel: 'This is the Jerusalem I've dreamed of!' And I believe we have succeeded. We've built more than 200 parks and made Jerusalem verdant."

Verdant it may be, but Jerusalem remains an insolvent city, lacking sufficient budget even to care appropriately for the parkland created by the foundation. As the years passed – and particularly after Cheshin moved from co-ordinating the foundation to its presidency 20 years ago – the organization's focus moved from beautification into projects to promote the city's economy and bolster education, coexistence and tolerance.

'We must learn to live side by side with mutual respect'

"What's absolutely clear is that every group that venerates Jerusalem – Jewish, Muslim and Christian – is staying here," says Cheshin. "No one is bowing out. And that means we must learn to live side by side with mutual respect and without mutual suspicion. If we have respect, the rest will come."

This perspective has translated into literally thousands of projects. Mishkenot Sha'ananim, the 19th-century housing project on what was Israel's border with Jordan from 1948 to 1967, has become an international cultural centre, bringing in musicians and writers from all over the world. The foundation's Ethics Center is Israel's most important source of applied ethics, taking teachers, physicians, lawyers, judges, police, army personnel and businesspeople countrywide through a program drawn up by Justice Meir Shamgar.

Jerusalem's Cinematheque, housed in a 19th-century ophthalmologic hospital, is a magnet for the city's youth. ("My children say they forgive me everything because of this!" says Cheshin, smiling.) Add to this Jerusalem's Zoo, its Tower of David and science museums, the Henry Crown Concert Hall and Khan Theater, Teddy Stadium and Sam Spiegel Film and Television School, along with dozens of synagogues and community centres citywide, and the list is only partial.

Coexistence is the current emphasis, not least "because we're the only ones doing it," according to Cheshin. The foundation has established a Jewish-Arab kindergarten ("Children who play, sing and eat together won't grow up to hate one another," she says), along with Jewish-Arab summer camps and basketball tournaments. The foundation's Democracy and Peace Institute is 20 years old, and the campus of a Hebrew-Arabic school is under construction.

Meanwhile, Jerusalem is abuzz with dance, jazz, chamber music, poetry and puppetry in foundation-inspired festivals and it hosts an international book fair every two years. There are hot meals for the elderly, outreach to the city's Ethiopian youngsters, and a long school day in needy neighbourhoods, which, says Cheshin, "isn't a babysitting service – it actually teaches children."

Cheshin, who is today a grandmother of six with half a century of public service behind her, has energy and passion for Jerusalem that burns undiminished. She remains active in many foundation initiatives, serving on the boards of the Israel Festival, Jerusalem Music Center, Mishkenot Sha'ananim Cultural Center and Guest House, and the Jerusalem Theater. She is also a director of her late grandfather's business, Teva Pharmaceuticals.

And, of course, she continues to preside over the foundation, today a multinational organization with branches in 10 countries, which has so far raised more than a billion dollars. Cheshin, however, is far from satisfied.

"While we spend an average $35 million a year helping the city, this is simply a drop in the ocean," she says. "Jerusalem is Israel's capital, and it has the potential to be the centre of everything. We've already seen how quickly it came back to life with the end of the intifadah. Just think if it received sufficient funding to address all its issues."

On the fingers of her hand, she itemizes these issues as education, housing, employment and society. More and better schools that teach for longer hours; support that will enable young academics to stay in the city; housing subsidies for young couples; and increased job opportunities, particularly for secular Jews living among the city's large haredi Jewish community.

Despite the immense challenges, Cheshin radiates optimism. "With hard work, all this will come," she says. "Jerusalem belongs to the world, and there are many people willing to help this city."

WHERE THEY ALL GATHER

Jews from all over the world — observant and non-observant — come to the Western Wall to "connect" in some way with their identities as Jews. Inset, the clasped hands on the stones convey the sense of hope and longing that the Wall has symbolized over the years. [G. Laforet and RNS photo]

Machane Yehuda goes from cheap to chic

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

Time was when Jerusalem's outdoor market was exactly that -- an open-air tangle of alleys heaped high with colorful fruits and vegetables, fish and meat, legumes and grains, dried fruits and nuts, all washed through with the scent of Turkish coffee and exotic spices.

Full of character and characters, it was known for the freshness of its produce and the bargains to be had, especially late on Friday, when prices plunge to rock-bottom.

Mazeitim in the Machane Yehuda market hopes to attract a new upmarket clientele with its boutique wines, olives and homemade bread. [IPS photos by Jean Hazout]

In the past few years, however, the Machane Yehuda market has become something more as well. This bastion of rough-and-ready second- and third-generation vendors, forcefully hawking their wares in the sprawling lanes between downtown Jerusalem's Jaffa and Agrippas Streets, has also become an attractive covered market – home to a growing number of chic restaurants and designer clothing stores.

"If the shuk was once known for its hummus, pita and rugelach, it's now developing a reputation for gazpacho, bruschetta and sashimi as well," says Eli Mizrachi, proprietor of a Mediterranean-type bistro called Tzachko, which he recently opened in the heart of the market.

The restaurant, whose specials of the day are determined according to the produce available in the market, is already the second undertaking of this 55 year-old son of a Machane Yehuda nut vendor.

Two years ago, on a nearby terrace next to a large butcher's shop and a couple of nuts and dried fruit stands, he launched Everything For The Baker And Coffee, Too, which both sells imported baking and kitchen equipment and serves Italian coffee and chocolate biscotti.

He has been joined by former high-tech professional Itzik Sananes, who opened the kosher deli Mazeitim across the way. Sananes sells cheeses produced in boutique Israeli dairies (although he imports the Brie and Chambrie), together with upscale wines from Israeli vineyards, olives and Tomer's bread, baked by a young Jerusalemite who runs a boutique bakery in Talpiot.

Sananes and Mizrachi are among a growing group who are aiming to make Machane Yehuda competitive with Jerusalem's other shopping areas – especially, they say, now that the security situation is better and the market, which has been a repeated and bloody terror target, is bustling once again.

"We want to keep this market alive and relevant in an age of shopping malls and superstores," says Mizrachi, who chairs Machane Yehuda's Council of Stallholders. "We don't want it going the way of Paris's Les Halles market. We want to see new alongside old."

So, flanking stallholders such as Boaz, who still stands behind the olive stand he has manned for 30 years, Eliezer, who has been selling nuts for more than 25 years, and Aliza, who bags vegetables as she has for the past 14 years, Machane Yehuda is gentrifying.

Since April 2005, three designer clothing stores have opened in the shuk. Bordeaux, the only one of the three that existed before opening in the market, relocated from Jerusalem's elegant Katamon neighbourhood to 6 Tut (Strawberry) Street, finding unlikely premises next door to a fishmonger and opposite a butcher.

"I've always loved the shuk and thought it'd be fun working in this environment," says owner Efrat Ben-Arza. "The difference going from a high-end business area to the bustling city centre has been huge, but I see great potential. I'm delighted to welcome customers who come to the market for tomatoes and end up buying one of my pashminas as well!"

The Alei Te'ena (Fig Leaves) fashion store chose a Machane Yehuda location at the suggestion of Eli Mizrachi, an old friend of co-owner Ronit Gilboa.

"At first I thought it was a mad idea," says Gilboa. "Who'd come to the shuk for stylish clothes? But later, talking it over with my partner Shoshi [Borenstein], we decided it was exactly the right place to create the personal kind of store we envisioned."

"Being in the shuk is very special," according to Limor Tov, co-owner of Egoz 30, the first designer boutique to open in Machane Yehuda. She and her partner Rahel Skimoul had been looking for a site that was both central and popular. "We realized that the shuk, with its colours, smells and warmth, reflects our style."

In general, the traditional market vendors have welcomed the newcomers, says Mizrachi. "The people working here want to make a living and they see that new enterprises bring more people here, people who didn't come to the market five years ago. This has helped them realize the importance of helping new initiatives become part of the market."

School helps poor, young olim adjust to modern Israel

By GAIL LICHTMAN
IPS

Abraham Farhi has his work cut out for him. As the principal of the Brandt Elementary School in Jerusalem's Neve Yaakov neighbourhood, not only does he face the ordinary challenges of educating 300 boys and girls in grades 1 through 6, but he has to do so in one of the city's poorest neighbourhoods and with children of whom 75 per cent are new immigrants to Israel (60 per cent from Ethiopia and 15 per cent from Muslim republics of the former Soviet Union).

"Most of our students have been in Israel only three to four years, and their families are still trying to integrate into life in this country," he says. "This transition is particularly difficult for Ethiopian families, who must adjust from rural Africa to urban Israel. Many of the parents still don't know Hebrew and have difficulty finding work. Those that do, work in minimum wage jobs doing cleaning, guarding, gardening and the like. Their income is not enough to support their large families, which tend to include between five and eight children, and they can barely pay their bills and put food on the table. Sometimes two or more children sleep in one bed because the parents can't afford to buy basic furniture.

"Add to this the fact that we have children who can't read or do basic math, in addition to not knowing Hebrew. Our school is expected to teach these children Hebrew, plus all the skills they need to enter junior high school in the few short years they are with us. This is a daunting task and requires providing more hours of instruction, tutoring, enrichment, help in obtaining school supplies and books, and even food."

Farhi adamantly insists that if the school can give these children a good education and the tools to cope with life in Israel, they will not constitute another generation living in poverty but "contribute towards the building of a healthy society in Israel. If we do not invest in them, we run the risk of them turning to a life of crime, drugs and despair."

The school's aims are twofold: one, to provide the knowledge and educational tools needed to successfully cope with life in Israel, and two, to obtain the necessary equipment and set up enrichment programs to expand the children's horizons.

In these endeavours, Farhi is finding a partner in the Jerusalem Foundation. In recent years, the foundation, now celebrating its 40th year, has invested intensely in efforts to bolster the educational infrastructure in Jerusalem's poorer neighbourhoods. In 2002, it brought its Caring Community project to Neve Yaakov, with the aim of empowering individuals and the community to improve children's futures through educational opportunities. And now it has prepared a special project to help the children of the Brandt School.

The foundation has drawn up a comprehensive three-year program to improve the school's abilities to better prepare its children for the challenges and complexities of 21st-century Israel.

The program, which has still not been fully implemented, includes professional development for teachers – how to more effectively teach math, Hebrew, reading, English and other basic subjects; how to recognize and deal with problems, as well as referring students for professional treatment if necessary; and how to cultivate independent learners. It also deals with pedagogic development, such as advancing scholastic achievement through new and innovative methods and strategies and special individual or small group sessions.

One of the key elements in the plan is a special science education program. Research has shown that children who receive encouragement in science and math in elementary school are more likely to go on to advanced studies in these subjects in high school.

Working in co-operation with the Jerusalem Education Authority, the Bloomfield Science Museum in Jerusalem and Hebrew University's Meyerhoff Youth Center for Advanced Studies, the foundation developed "From Mars to Molecules" for fifth and sixth grade students.

The program consists of 12 study days over the course of the school year. Working in small groups, the children will study Mars and astronomy, electricity and electromagnetism, medicines, the world of the microscope, criminal identification and chemicals and senses. After that, they will conduct experiments in state-of-the-art labs and visit the Bloomfield Museum and the Meyerhoff Center.

Extra study and 'enrichment' each day

Parental involvement is seen as critical in the success of a child's education. Building on the Caring Community, the program will expand on activities instituted by the Brandt School, such as teaching Hebrew to adults in the evenings and a "Roots" program designed to strengthen parent-child links to their heritage, with additional parent-child activities, special information days and trips.

The Brandt School is part of the extended school day program of the Jerusalem Education Authority. This means that the children study from 8 a.m. to 3:30 pm instead of the usual school day that ends at 1 p.m. This enables the school to provide extra hours of instruction, as well as enrichment activities.

But until last year, the school didn't have the resources to provide hot meals to sustain the children into the afternoon hours.

As a first step toward implementing the Jerusalem Foundation program, a hot meals program was started to ensure that every child receives a balanced, nutritious hot lunch.

"If the children are hungry, they can't focus on their studies," notes Inbal Vaknin, assistant project manager of the Jerusalem Foundation. "This enables them to function in the afternoons. Plus it also teaches them about good eating habits, which has long-term health implications."

"I don't mind the long school day," says Israel, a sixth grader who came from Ethiopia. "We have nothing to do after school anyway. We would just end up hanging out in the streets and getting into trouble. It's good we get lunch. This allows us to stay longer in school. And we study better after we eat."

Farhi constantly emphasizes that the enrichment programs the school provides are not luxuries.

"These children do not have computers at home," he says. "If they are not exposed to computers and the Internet in school, they will not be computer literate – a skill now essential in our society. If we do not expose them to science, music, art, etc., no one will. We have to open the world to them and get them involved and interested."

Plus, he notes, art, music and sports are universal languages.

"Being able to succeed in these areas compensates for the children's difficulties in studies and learning Hebrew when they first arrive," relates Mazal Amsalem, the school's science and art teacher. "It gives them something they can excel in and makes them feel good about themselves, thus bolstering their self confidence and will to persevere in their studies."

The children's school trip this year enabled them to see a little of the country, sometimes for the first time.

"We went to the Hadera power station," says Gadi, a sixth grader who came from Ethiopia. "I have been in Israel six years, but I had never seen the sea. It was great. And the power station was really something. Now I am interested in electricity and want to learn more about it."

Farhi, who came to Israel in his youth from Syria, understands what it's like to be a newcomer trying to learn the language and fit in.

He repeatedly tells the children, "I was once a new immigrant just like you. People reached out to help me. Now, I am reaching out to help you. And one day, you too will be reaching out to help others."

Multimedia exhibit presents 3,000 years of Jewish history

By SHARON KANON
IPS

Award-winning designer Eliav Nahlieli was commissioned by the Western Wall Heritage Foundation and the Israel government to create a special experience linking young people today with the heritage of millions of Jews.

The result is the Chain of Generations Center, which opened last year just a few short metres from the Kotel. The Chain takes visitors on a spiritual journey through what Nahlieli calls "an experiential, theatrical museological world," linking them to their cultural and historical roots through music, light, smoke and, in particular, through the monumental sculptures of glass artist and sculptor Jeremy Langford.

To follow the Chain, the visitor descends into the catacombs adjacent to the Western Wall plaza, just 50 metres from the bedrock of Mount Moriah – the Temple Mount. Visitors are guided through 3,000 years of history – from the binding of Isaac by Abraham in 2000 BCE to the Jerusalem of David and Solomon, Kings, Prophets and the Herodian Second Temple, and centuries of conquest and ruin, yearning and rebuilding.

Nahlieli's main inspiration for the centre's concept came from a story written by Moshe Amirav, a paratrooper during the 1967 Six Day War, while recovering from a wound during the battle for the liberation of Jerusalem. "It is about a Polish Jew whose biggest dream is to walk in the streets of Jerusalem," said Nahlieli. "Even when he and his friends are skeletons in the camps, he hallucinates that they are dancing and singing, 'Next year in Jerusalem.' They are all killed in the Holocaust. From then on, the paratrooper feels that he is fighting not only on behalf of the present generation but for the hundreds of generations that have gone before."

At the heart of the exhibition are eight majestic glass sculptures created by the British-born Langford, each in a separate chamber, to symbolize major events in Jewish history.

"Jerusalem," etched into a glass column against a background of verses from Chronicles, is the first of the sculptures created by Langford, who is recognized as the leading glass artist in Israel today.

"I envisioned the glass pieces as milestones to symbolize landmarks on the path taken by our ancestors," said Nahlieli. These were inspired by the Romans' use of milestones and the tombstones in the Jewish cemetery in Prague. The physical design of the centre was inspired by an Escher illustration of marching figures going up a ramp.

The Holocaust* is a stacked and sculpted glass block split into six sections and etched with names of victims of the Holocaust.

"I wanted to create a feeling of endless movement as the visitor walks slowly along the long, long trail."

The designer's eclectic creativity has gained him international recognition and won him the THEA award in 2000 (presented by Disney, Universal and Fox studios) for his innovative design of the Palmach Museum in Tel Aviv. He has also been a guest designer at the Smithsonian Institution in Washington, D.C., and Walt Disney Imagineering, which plans theme parks, and designed exhibits in Prague, Pompeii, Venice and Istanbul as well as Israel.

Langford describes himself as an architectural glass artist who works with his environment. "I have created many glass art works for public buildings, synagogues and private residences around the world," said Langford, "but this was my biggest dream, and my greatest challenge."

Langford used a cold-glass method of carving, which involves using many thousands of layers of glass to create impressive sculpted and stacked glass monuments. "The layers echo the layers of history of the Jewish people and the different civilizations that have built on and inhabited Jerusalem," said Langford.

It took Langford five years and 150 tons of glass to design and complete the project. His wife Yael, a chemist, helped him solve any technical problems he encountered along the way.

"Before I began, I sat whole nights in the tunnels, sometimes from midnight till dawn, connecting to the energy of the site. I communed with kings, prophets, conquerors, holy men and madmen," said Langford. The artist decided to use abstract forms – columns with straight lines etched with names – to avoid the biblical prohibition against graven images. "I did not want to interfere with the viewer's own image of the biblical personality."

The Patriarchs, which has the names of Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob, Rachel and Leah etched into three green-tinted pillars, leads the historical procession, followed by a row of columns in a narrow passage with the names of the 12 tribes.

"Carved in Hebrew, the names of individuals from early biblical times up to the present have deep significance," says Langford, a student of Kabbalah. "The lines in Hebrew letters have energy and spiritual dimensions."

The visitor walks along a ramp made of wooden planks to the era symbolizing Jerusalem. A separate glass sculpture in the foreground honours the importance of Moshe, Aaron and Miriam (who led the way to freedom and nationhood).

Destruction (of the First and Second Temples) and the Exile is the title of the next sculpture – cracked black glass panels between slanting stacked glass columns. To emphasize the theme, the focus of the next chamber is 48 shattered column stumps strewn on the ground and lit with fibre optics.

A highlight of the journey is the nine-metre-high, 15-ton Yearning pillar, representing the symbolic return to the Promised Land of Israel. An unexpected challenge (albeit an exciting discovery) foiled the original plan to pour concrete and sink the pillar into the ground. Archeologists on site found oil pots from the time of the Hasmoneans (on Chanukah, no less) and a ritual bath from the Second Temple period during excavations.

Langford and his team found a perfect solution – to suspend the pillar in the air on steel girders connected to the Roman period walls of the chamber. Visitors walk over a glass floor. Looking up, they can view the pillar; looking down, they see the ancient ritual bath.

Even more exciting was the rare archeological find that was discovered when workers were preparing steel girders to support the sculpture – a portion of the Wall from King Solomon's First Temple.

The sculpture entitled The Holocaust is a stacked and sculpted glass block split into six sections. It is etched with names of victims of the Holocaust. "I agonized over this sculpture for many months. I then saw the column, broken and fractured but still a column," said Langford.

Reawakening, symbolizing the return to the Land of Israel, is expressed in a cluster of columns – like buildings in a city – of different heights, sleek, strong and proud. Here the names etched into the handsome columns are, according to Langford, "random names from the telephone book, making sure we had all the cities and towns of modern Israel represented."

The final glass sculpture – a rough-textured, wavy memorial wall titled Remembrance, honours the soldiers killed in the battles for Jerusalem in 1948 and 1967.

To complete the tour, the visitor is invited into a small, dimly lit subterranean theatre. While candles burn and delicate rays of light are reflected off the walls, the moving story of the paratrooper who fought in the victorious battle to reunite Jerusalem is told. The image of the narrator is projected onto a screen, intermittently disappearing into the smoke and light before reappearing.

Visitors emerge onto the Western Wall plaza – a fitting end to an altogether unusual and exciting tour – reinforcing the fact that they themselves are another link in the chain of generations.

Langford has just completed two massive columns for Jerusalem Day – one geometric, representing the army, the other, a flowing surface, representing souls – which are to be placed in a niche at the foot of the Memorial Wall. The inscription reads: "How the brave have fallen."

Canadian youths gain life experience in Israel

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts and Travel Editor

A few months ago, when Jordan Lass was volunteering with Magen David Adom ambulance service in Petach Tikvah, a routine call came in – the driver said a woman badly needed CPR.

"After 45 minutes of chaotic and tireless efforts at CPR, we were sure the woman had little chance of survival," Lass says. "After a few final compressions that seemed to be in vain, miraculously the beeps on the EKG system continued without our assistance – the woman was to live.

"It was the most exciting, fear-filled moment I have ever endured, yet the most fulfilling experience I have had in my entire life."

Lass is one of thousands of youths participating in long-term programs supported by MASA (Hebrew for "journey"), a newly created program run by the government of Israel and the Jewish Agency that financially supports hundreds of programs through grants and scholarships.

Lass and his friend Aaron Rosenberg, 18, also of Toronto, are participating in Hadassah's Young Judaea Year Course, a nine-month gap program designed for recent high school graduates. The course consists of three trimesters: two periods of community volunteer and living experiences and a period of formal academic studies and field trips in Jerusalem.

"In Jerusalem, we really built a strong connection to the holy city and the interesting people that call it home," Rosenberg said.

When I met Rosenberg and Lass they were in their final trimester in Bat Yam, a small, poorer city south of Tel Aviv that is home to Russian and Ethiopian immigrants. They live independently in apartments and spend the mornings teaching English in local schools. In the afternoon, they run extra-curricular activities for troubled youths.

Rosenberg spent the second part of his trimester working at Tirat Hayeled, an Israeli orphanage in Netanya. "I was a counsellor for boys aged eight to 13. They're kids from broken homes, they're in a bad situation," he said. "They really looked up to me and taught me about Israeli society as I taught them English and life skills."

Rosenberg said one of his most memorable experiences was engaging in a political debate on a bus from Tel Aviv to Bat Yam.

"I had never had such an intense political debate anywhere, and I think this is the beauty of Israel. One can have an engaging political discussion on something as normal as a mundane bus ride."

Rosenberg has developed a strong connection to Jewish tradition and life while in Israel. "I wear a kippah every day, something I haven't done since I was 12," he said, "and I keep all the holidays and their respective mitzvot. More than anything, I feel a need to pass my traditions and Yiddishkeit on to the next generation. These are words that would have never come out of me before Israel."

His friend concurs. "I have been forced to reflect on my spirituality and my beliefs to the extent that ideas and values that I could and would never accept before have become the cornerstones of my beliefs," Lass said.

Matthew Coorsh

Lass said he joined the program because he thought it was the best way to spend a year in Israel and connect with Israelis. "I thought this program is the best for combining an academic and a living experience. For instance, we have to go grocery shopping in Hebrew."

MASA was created in 2004 to give Jewish youths age 18 to 30 the experience of a long-term stay in Israel. As of this fall, each Canadian participant is guaranteed $2,000 (depending on the type of program) plus scholarships for those who need it based on family income and the cost of the program. In return, each participant is expected to contribute at least 20 hours of community service in Israel.

There are over 140 programs covering a broad range of activities youths can participate in. They can continue their education at an Israeli university, study Jewish texts, teach English, do internships, volunteer, participate in gap programs, live on a kibbutz or study music.

This year 8,000 youths from more than 50 countries were part of the MASA program. MASA aims to have 20,000 participants a year. Programs are scattered throughout Israel, from Jerusalem and Tel Aviv to the Negev and the Galilee.

Matthew Coorsh, 29, from Toronto, had just started his internship at the Israeli Knesset when I met him in Jerusalem in March. This is part of the MASA program he's participating in, the Career Israel Program, a five-month internship program open to college and university graduates from around the world.

"I've only been here for a month and really am just starting," he said. "I'll be doing some interesting things. I got interested in government politics back home and thought this would be a good experience."

Coorsh studied history at York University and got a diploma in public relations. "I'm hoping to get a job in foreign affairs or something like that, and I'm hoping something good will happen out of this program."

He said the MASA program has been extremely helpful. "You can't just walk off the street into the Knesset and get a job, otherwise."

Born in Montreal and raised in a secular home, Coorsh went to Israel on the birthright program in 2001, and his outlook has changed a lot since then. "Birthright was an appetizer, and I really wanted to immerse myself in the Israeli culture. I haven't ruled out making aliyah," he said.

Aliyah is not necessarily the stated goal of the MASA program. MASA is about strengthening Jewish identity and having youths make a connection with Israel.

"We're not trying to make them more religious," Israel Maimon, government of Israel secretary, said at the Prime Minister's Office in Jerusalem. "But if they do make aliyah, then that's a great by-product."

In fact, MASA's organizers hope many return home and become community leaders who can make some kind of positive impact in the Diaspora.

Another young person seriously considering making aliyah is Chaim Cutler, 22, from Toronto. Cutler is also participating in one of the MASA programs. He's at the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, which immerses its students in the study of classical Jewish texts.

"I wanted to come to Pardes to improve my Jewish knowledge and to live in Israel," he told me at the Institute after a spiel on Purim evening. "This is a co-ed program where we study the Talmud, Chumash, Bible and more modern commentary, as well as modern Jewish writers like Buber and Heschel."

Chaim Cutler

Cutler comes from a traditional Conservative home and went to Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto and the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) before studying commerce at McGill in Montreal. "I felt a big void in my Jewish learning throughout university. Coming to Pardes for the year gave me an excellent opportunity to fill that void."

He plans on returning to Toronto to work in accounting, but hopes to make aliyah in a few years.

"I've definitely thought about it before, but my desire to make aliyah has strengthened since I've been here," he said. "MASA is a great program that helps young people through their funding of long-term programs."

Like Coorsh, Ronnie Ollo, 20, of Montreal, who was studying political science at McGill, is also interning at the Knesset, as part of the overseas program at Tel Aviv University.

"I work for the Christian and Jewish Alliance Caucus, translating and preparing press releases," Ollo said over dinner at a Tel Aviv Hotel. "I spend time in the Israeli parliament which is a very exciting atmosphere to be in."

Ollo said his stay in Israel has been the time of his life. "It's the experience of a lifetime. Israeli society is very friendly."

Spending time with Israelis is one of the major attractions, he said. "My personal goals are to improve my Hebrew to perfection. I want to get a better sense of what it's like to live here, and I want to develop strong connections with the local people."

Bradley Armeland from Windsor, Ont., is participating in the Otzma program, a service-based leadership development program designed to offer Jewish adults ages 20 to 26 an opportunity to live and volunteer in Israel for 10 months in a variety of settings. So far Armeland has volunteered at a Be'er Sheva absorption centre and at a food bank. When I spoke to him in Tel Aviv he was volunteering at an army base. "Just cleaning rifles," he said.

Armeland was looking for something that would bring him to Israel for a longer time than birthright. "I read about the MASA program and saw it had lots of free time, was very educational and was exactly what I wanted. It's a good choice for me."

He especially likes Tel Aviv. "I'm always finding something new in this place," he said. "Plus, there's always the beach."

He said his sociable nature has been very helpful. "I've learned that I can meet anyone I want here. I've met tons and tons of people, and everybody knows each other. It's a great experience."

At 18, Marlee Hershfield from Vancouver is in Be'er Sheva, away from her family for the first time. She is participating in the Nativ program, volunteering in the Ye'elim Absorption Centre. She lives in the centre in a separate dorm-like environment she shares with five other girls. The rooms are Spartan and clean. Apparently the residents were notified about the impending arrival of more than 20 journalists from around the world.

Nativ is a challenging, academic, year-long program dedicated to creating and inspiring the Conservative Jewish leaders of the future. It is geared toward gap year students, between high school and university. From September to June, participants engage in different programs, studying Hebrew and Jewish studies in Jerusalem and volunteering at places such as the absorption centre.

Jerusalem: A personal exploration

By MEL NOODELMAN

This past January, the Jerusalem Foundation hosted a journalists' mission to the city to commemorate the 40th anniversary of the city's reunification and of the establishment of the foundation. It was my first trip to Israel and I was thrilled to have the opportunity to take part.

Oranges for sale in the market.

As our foundation hosts guided us through the old and new sections of the city, we were given a first-hand look at an incredible number of initiatives aimed at building infrastructure and fostering social and cultural bonding for which the foundation provides financial and moral support.

I felt hopeful after our meetings with some of the most forward thinking leaders and planners that the many grassroots initiatives could help bridge cultural differences and overcome ancient animosity. Mostly social experiments, however, they require a lot more funding and tremendous effort to be truly meaningful.

I was also mesmerized by the visual feast that seemed to be everywhere. The city was alive, and watching it through my camera lens was exhausting.

Ancient grace, the subtle dignity of the people, the blend of colours all vied for my attention. My camera's two-gigabyte memory card could hold 325 images. I used the full capacity nearly every day, collapsing on the bed each afternoon completely spent, but wonderfully contented.

The Old City

Every cliché about the Old City's timeless beauty is absolutely true. But the vitality on the streets, the colours of a gaggle of girls in school uniform, and the nonchalant teenagers in battle fatigues casually holding automatic weapons all worked together as if to say, "This is normal life in a city that is far from normal."

As I sat at an outdoor café, the diversity of people from different cultures, values, economic and social circumstance all paraded by. It's remarkable that this can exist at all. That it's taken for granted in this wonderful place left me incredulous.

However, the places where we had to be shepherded quickly and carefully to avoid potential violence were a reminder of the tensions that live just below the surface.

Machane Yehuda Market

One afternoon, we had some free time to just wander by ourselves, so I struck off on my own to the open-air market of Machane Yehuda. It took me a full 25 minutes to move a couple of hundred feet. Every moment, something else would catch my eye. If I moved to capture one image, I lost another.

I wanted a few strawberries as a snack, so I approached a fruit stand. I pressed a couple of shekels into the fruit merchant's hands. He looked at me, quite accurately, like I was a crazy tourist. Putting a few strawberries in a bag, he shooed me away, making sure that I knew I hadn't given him enough money to make the transaction worth his while, and that he was happy for me to leave so he could attend to some real customers. The berries were delightful, and sated, I moved on a few more feet in the crowd.

The Children

A visit to the Max Rayne Hand in Hand School for Arab-Jewish Education in south Jerusalem demonstrated that Arab and Israeli children don't have to carry animosities into the next generation. This special school has two of everything, one Arab and one Jewish: two principals, two teachers in every class, two guidance counsellors and two nurses.

Yet there were grim reminders at every turn that the safety and security of children is paramount and not taken lightly. This was never more evident than my encounter with some children in a park. When one of the children noticed me taking photographs, he charged towards me accusingly. This was not allowed, he said. After I gave a proper explanation to the teacher in charge, the kids all jostled for position to have their picture taken. But the way suspicion quickly turned to friendship was alien to me. I couldn't imagine Canadian kids taking security so seriously.

'I wasn't prepared for our visit to the Western Wall'

The Center for Middle Eastern Classical Music

Meeting Avi Shoshani, the director of this music centre, is an overwhelming experience. He is one of the gentlest souls I have ever encountered and seems to glow as he describes the musical history of the Middle East.

He held us spellbound for the better part of an hour, describing the roots of classical eastern music, the influences over the centuries from North Africa to Central Asia and India. These musical roots are shared by Israelis and Arabs alike, who study together in his institution, learning to play ancient Middle Eastern instruments with exotic names such as the oud, baghlama, tar, nei, balaban, darbuka, zarb and more.

We were then treated to an impromptu concert by a four-person group called Tahmila. I came away renewed and invigorated to see how music operates as a fundamental cultural bridge capable of bringing together the cultures that are so often at odds with each other. I was amazed when I returned to Toronto that my daughter was well aware of Tahmila and waiting to attend their March concert in Toronto.

The Wall

I wasn't prepared for our visit to the Western Wall. The heavy security entering the plaza was an interesting, if saddening, experience.

The sight of all manner of Jews davening in front of the wall met my expectations. As I placed my piece of paper in one of the cracks with all the other bits of paper and said Shehechiyanu, I was still fairly nonchalant.

Returning to our group, however, I suddenly found myself crying uncontrollably. At first, no one from the group realized my emotional state, as I turned away and covered my eyes.

I was overwhelmed with conflicting emotions. I knew that my father would never see this sight again (he no longer travels abroad). I thought of my daughters and their own personal struggles and challenges.

And I knew that I was not alone, that all who come here have a moment of spirituality that is unique yet universal. Here, we are all the same. We share the same moment with the countless generations that have preceded us, as well as those that will follow.

It is a place outside of the world, yet a nexus that unites us all, a place where time means nothing, and where small pieces of paper that carry hope or despair will continue to be written, received into the holy spaces and gathered up to make room for the notes that will certainly follow.

Beneath the Wall

The Kotel tunnel tour was an incredible look back through 2,000 years of history. As we walked through the excavations, you could see the layers of time peeled back like the layers of an onion, with each successive age built on the remains of the preceding one. The different types of construction and the quality of the stonework told much about each stage of civilization.

Each layer bore silent witness to another age of conquest, war, destruction and then rebuilding of walls. We were witnessing 2,000 years of enmity and destruction, as well as of optimism and rebuilding.

Exiting once more into the light of the courtyard, bar mitzvah celebrations were underway, shining faces enjoying the moment. The rabbis in deep discussion caught my eye, and I waited patiently to capture the accompanying image, one of the many that I would hold forever in my camera and in my heart.

Israel's green missionaries

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN

Migrant workers manoeuvre through a south Tel Aviv neighbourhood traffic peddling reams of colourful fabric on their rickshaws. Muslim women dressed in hijabs zigzag around fresh carrot juice stands to enter wholesale clothing shops; a young woman in platform heels carries a half-finished canvas to a nearby art school.

These images, mixed with the heady smells of an oriental spice market and car fumes, are typical on Herzl Street in south Tel Aviv – a place where cultures from the east and west meet and sometimes collide.

It is appropriate then that in the midst of this action, you can find the headquarters of the Heschel Center for Environmental Learning and Leadership, an environmental education training facility devoted to helping cultures from the east and west live in harmony.

"Our approach is solving environmental issues through social change in Israel," says American-born Eilon Schwartz, the founder and director of Heschel. "We never dissociate the environment from the society that lives in it, making our environmental approach attractive and different from models used in other western countries such as America and Australia."

Adviser, mentor and educator to green organizations, politicians, universities and religious communities, the Heschel Center is arguably the heart and mind behind Israel's environmental movement.

If you open a newspaper in Israel and read an environmental expose, chances are staff from the Heschel Center had a hand in it; same is true if you hear about Muslim religious leaders learning about recycling practices in Israel; or that art schools in Jerusalem are teaching courses on sustainable design.

Heschel Center's activities range far and wide. But at its core is a one-year environmental fellows program that disseminates culturally relevant environmental education to communities across the country. The fellows, who consist of journalists, lawyers, architects and politicians, meet once a week at the centre, where they are given the language and skills needed to integrate environmental practices into every aspect of their career. About 20 fellows a year participate and learn everything from the basics of lobbying the government on green issues to setting up their own environmental businesses.

"Our strategy is not on victories or issues," Schwartz said. "We are doing capacity building for a whole society. We show leaders how to plan a different and sustainable vision for agriculture and transportation and one that includes community involvement."

Admitting that environmental victories are important, Schwartz credits other Israeli green organizations for taking that lead. "Instead, we find a cadre of leaders that will lead individual sectors and network amongst each other. We are not just working with ecologists or lawyers or environmental scientists. And people get excited about that," he said.

Hussein Tarabieh, an Israeli Arab from Sakhnin in Israel's north, is using skills from his Heschel fellowship experience to establish peaceful ties between like-minded Israelis and their Palestinian neighbours.

Tarabieh graduated from the first class of Heschel fellows eight years ago. As the general manager of his town's environmental education centre, Tarabieh made the once-a-week journey to Tel Aviv for a year to learn how to communicate green issues better.

"I knew how to present scientific environmental evidence to people who came through my centre," says Tarabieh, who teaches youth and adults, "but Heschel helped to give me the language in a social context that people in my community could really absorb.

"The establishment of the Heschel Center and its programs has helped promote and accelerate the environment movement in Israel, mainly in the area of leadership activities. All the people that learn there get a new vision for their work toward a sustainable Israel," he said.

Movement for change

Today, Tarabieh teaches about 50,000 people every year, transmitting policies of Israel's Ministry of Environmental Protection to an Arab-speaking population that might otherwise not receive this information at schools or at work.

But Tarabieh is not stopping at his hometown. He recently signed an agreement with politicians in the Palestinian Authority to help transfer the much-needed basics of environmental health to Palestinians. In the Gaza Strip, for example, the raw sewage of two million people gets dumped straight into the sea without passing through a processing plant.

"I am using environmental education as a bridge of peace to promote green and energy conservation activities," Tarabieh said.

Nisreen Mazzawi, an Israeli-Arab woman and environmental activist who studied as a Heschel fellow last year, has run a successful class for Arab women living in the north.

"Arab people in Israel aren't really associating environmental issues with politics and the economy, but this class was amazing for them," Mazzawi said.

Schwartz said he is currently working with Brown University to put together a coalition of like-minded partner organizations from around the world, to learn from each other's work; and with the Wuppertal Institute in Germany, to co-develop initiatives in environmental purchasing.

"One of Israel's greatest strengths is that the country is an ideal beta site for testing environmental policy and projects," notes David Pearlman Paran, Heschel's resource development co-ordinator.

"Israel is a small country, and some sectors are relatively undeveloped when it comes to environmental education, but that's not necessarily a bad thing," Paran added, pointing to Bedouin villages in Israel's south as an example.

Once a nomadic people, Bedouins now look to establish the basic infrastructure of modern life such as electricity and running water in their villages, some remotely located. A recent project, developed in part by Heschel, outfitted an entire village with solar panels to serve the community's basic energy needs.

To further facilitate the Bedouins' transition to western life, a Heschel fellow is helping to implement a low-interest micro-financing loan system in their communities, so that every family that wants them will be able to afford solar panels.

"Maybe we can help the Bedouins skip the stage that the west went through of using polluting fuel such as oil," suggests Paran. "As Israelis, and living in a small country where information travels quickly, we can learn from the mistakes that other countries have made, and can present good arguments as to why developing communities should use solar power straight away."

The urban environment in places like Tel Aviv, notes Paran, is also a priority for Heschel's educators, who often go to schools or are called on by tourist operators to give "sustainable city" tours. Paran also makes himself available at the drop of a hat, to give contacts and research to journalists reporting on the environment.

Recently, Paran was proud to report on a pilot project initiated by Heschel, which will be used to show Israelis how to green the urban office space. Among its other projects, Heschel has also set up a support program for university graduates studying ecological economics and is about to launch a new sustainability education and action centre for Israelis travelling in Katmandu, Nepal.

"We are the bubbling core of movements for social and environmental change in Israel," said Paran.

MERITAS LAW FIRMS WORLDWIDE

Danny Angel (centre) and late Jerusalem mayor Teddy Kollek with a cake picturing the Old City walls, prepared for Kollek by the Angel Bakery to mark 25 years in office.

Danny Angel – not about bread alone

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

How would you imagine a master baker's inner sanctum? White aprons and clouds of flour? Baking trays and inventories? Wrong. Papers cover most of the surfaces in the office of Danny Angel, Israel's premier baker, sharing space with stacked boxes of Cuban cigars. But it's the walls that tell about the man.

There are photos everywhere, showing Angel during most of his 88 years, his hair and mustache growing from black through grey to silver, his waistline increasing. He embraces Yitzhak Rabin, Shimon Peres, Teddy Kollek, Ezer Weizmann and Yitzhak Navon (a former classmate). He is at dinner with Elizabeth Taylor, hugs Danny Kaye and stands arm-in-arm with Rudy Giuliani. Among the celebrity shots are family photos – from a stiffly posed couple who are Danny's grandparents, Shlomo and Esther, founders of the Angel Bakery in 1927, down to the business's fourth generation of Angels, Danny's son, nephew and niece.

Pictures of Danny Angel with soldiers and manufacturers, with new baking technology and with bread nudge dozens of framed citations and certificates – Angel as a Jerusalem Worthy, as a Jerusalem Prize laureate, as a Notable Industrialist, as president of Israel's Variety Clubs, Rotary Club and Manufacturers' Association. And dwarfing every other picture is a large painting of a young, smiling and clear-eyed soldier – Angel's 20-year-old son Ariel, killed on the Suez Canal in 1970.

An eighth-generation Jerusalemite who has worked in the family bakery for 75 years, Danny Angel's life runs parallel to that of the city he helped develop and the nation he helped build.

"I was seven years old when my grandfather Shlomo acquired a bakery in Bayit Vegan from a bankrupt client," he says. "At the time, my grandfather was a dried goods merchant who travelled regularly to Damascus, Alexandria and Beirut to buy flour and other foods, but when the bakery came into his hands, he decided to operate it. It reopened the next year, 1927, and by the time I was 13, my after-school job on Mondays, Wednesdays and Fridays was collecting money from the grocery stores to which we sold our bread. On Thursdays it was helping to bake and braid the challah."

In those early days, 25 workers produced 8,500 loaves of bread a week and delivered them in two trucks and a horse and cart. "The horse and cart were more efficient than the trucks," Angel recalls, "because the horse knew the route as well as the driver, so there was no problem when the driver was off sick!"

While Angel never doubted where his future lay, the family bakery was only part of the picture. "At the same time I began working in the bakery, I also enlisted in the Haganah," he says, naming the pre-State defence force. "Nine years later, in 1941, when I was 22, I volunteered for the British army and served in Egypt and the western desert. After that, I joined the Jewish Brigade and fought in Italy."

Angel stayed on in Europe after World War II ended, working with Aliyah Bet smuggling Jewish immigrants into Mandate Palestine. By 1948, when Israel was fighting for independence, he was back in Jerusalem, where his British military training equipped him to help defend the city.

At the same time, the Angel Bakery was playing its own role in the city's defence. "Three times a week, we'd bring bread in convoys to the fighters in Jerusalem's besieged Old City and on Mount Scopus," he recalls. "Hidden inside the sacks of bread were guns and ammunition."

Food and water ran low during the brutal siege of Jerusalem, but Angel's kept baking bread for the starving city: fire trucks brought water, and flour was swept up off the bakery floor.

With the war fought and won, it was time for change. The small Bayit Vegan plant was sold. Two of Shlomo's three sons moved to Haifa, where they built and opened the city's second largest bakery. The third son was Danny's father. He and Danny built the modern bakery that is still the company's home in Jerusalem's Givat Shaul neighborhood.

"We chose the area because it was close to the flour mill that we still use," Angel says. "We built Israel's first flour silo, and in 1965, brought a Texas company to Israel to build a 750-foot pipeline from mill to silo through which we bring 120 tons of flour to the bakery each day. The City of Jerusalem initially opposed the pipeline, as it had to go above ground, but we convinced them, and later won Israel's Kaplan Prize for Industrial Efficiency."

Modernization and innovation are the hallmark of both baking and business practice in the Givat Shaul plant into which the company moved in 1956, and in the Angel Bakeries opened in Lod in 1995 and Netivot in 1999. The Angels brought the first long ovens to Israel: 90 feet in length, they each bake 1,800 loaves an hour. The family also developed plant-based emulsifiers, which combine water and oil in the bread-making process and eliminate the kashrut problems of animal-based equivalents.

To ensure freshly baked bread for Sunday mornings after the bakery is closed for Shabbat, they found and imported a British-made mixer that can create dough in two hours rather than six. And in Hungary, they found machinery that cleans wheat, enabling them to bake whole-wheat products. It was Angel Bakeries that introduced sliced bread into the Israeli market and found ways to integrate soy flour into breads. And Angel is McDonald's sole supplier of hamburger buns in Israel.

Today, Angel's three bakeries produce 35 per cent of all bread eaten in Israel. Using 5,000 tons of flour a month, they bake more than 500,000 fresh loaves a day, produce 100 different types of bread and 250 different types of cake and cookies. Their fleet of 200 trucks (the horse and cart long since phased out) transports Angel produce to 6,000 stores and hundreds of hotels and army bases countrywide. Once a month, a full refrigerated shipping container of Angel's cakes and borekas is sent to Brooklyn, N.Y.

"Even by international standards Angel Bakeries is considered a giant," says Danny Angel. But, he emphasizes, it is not a faceless industry. "We have 1,800 employees – Israelis, new immigrants, Palestinians, several of them third-generation with us – and we've never had a single strike. In fact, the only time our bakery ever closes is Shabbat, festivals and Pesach."

Angel Bakeries was floated on the Tel Aviv Stock Exchange in 1984, the first Israeli bakery to go public, but it remains a family business. Management has passed from Danny's eldest brother Avraham, a lawyer by training, to his daughter, Ruthie. Production and technology have moved from Danny's second brother Ovadia, a pharmacist and chemist, to his son Gadi. Company directorship has been handed from Danny to his son Yaron.

A graduate of the American University in Beirut and of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, fluent in seven languages, Danny Angel is equally comfortable on the factory floor, at international baking conventions, among celebrities, in the corridors of power and working for the many good causes to which he devotes much of his time. Recently slowed down by health problems, he has cut his 12-hour working day to six, but the cigar remains clenched between his teeth, his mind remains razor-sharp and he is still filled with joy at what he and his family have created.

Jerusalem:
City of Peace

By BARUCH COHEN

In honour of Prof. Frederick Krantz

O Jerusalem shining and bright
Embraced forever with your people's love

O my people I would sing my heart
On this night of glory
My city of love on whose Hills my father Abraham's
Painful trial
The tears of generations of my people
Have not dared extinguish
The flames of eternal sacrifice
The flames of infinite love.
Clouds of unbearable thunder,
Lighting and endless tears
Carry me on this ever lasting night
With endless generations' might
To you beloved Jerusalem
Ir Shalom
City of Peace
Embraced forever with my People's love!

PLEDGING ALLEGIANCE TO JERUSALEM

Thousands of Israelis marched last year around the walls of the Old City to proclaim their support for a Jerusalem united for eternity. [Isranet photo]

'We are the privileged generation'

Teddy Kollek died on Jan. 2. The following is excerpted from the Foreword he wrote in The Jerusalem Anthology: A Literary Guide, Reuven Hammer, The Jewish Publication Society, 1995.

By TEDDY KOLLEK

In spite of many changes in control and changes in name over the centuries, [Jerusalem] has remained the City of David. There have been periods when Jews were not permitted to live in Jerusalem, though modern research indicates that such times were fewer than was previously thought, but there was never a moment when Jerusalem did not live within the Jews – as individuals and as a people.

Jewish independent rule over Jerusalem ceased in the year 70 CE and was not restored until 1948, and fully in 1967. We are the privileged generation of Jews who have seen with our own eyes the return to Zion. We are those spoken of by the psalmist: "When the Lord restored our exiles to Zion, it was like a dream." (Psalms 126:1).

Yet Jerusalem must be the centre for all Jews; tolerance must reign amongst us, and Jews and Arabs must live together in peace. For a united Jerusalem to exist and flourish, we have to forge mutual respect and a willingness to understand and accommodate each other.

It has been a privilege to serve Jerusalem and its people for many decades and to be the first Jewish mayor of modern, united Jerusalem. I prefer to think of myself and my work here, not in terms of Herod, who for all his building cared more for himself than for the city, but as the heir of Nehemiah. It was Nehemiah who, at the end of the first exile, came back to Jerusalem in order to seek its "good" and energetically put the people to work.

His task, like ours, was not easy, but he succeeded in laying the foundations for the new Jerusalem which existed until the end of the Second Temple period.

We too have returned to Zion from exile. We too face enemies and problems, but we have dedicated ourselves to building and to creating a renewed Jerusalem that will be worthy of its past and able to endure to endure into the future. May Jerusalem's next millennium be remembered as Jerusalem's true age of gold, a time of harmony and peace.

Congratulations

Historic Khan Theater turns 40

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

There are two dozen men and women gathered. Some are seated, some doodle, others pace. They are there to brainstorm, and the atmosphere is electric with ideas. A tall man suddenly breaks into an improvisation to illustrate his point. Two people co-opt a third in a brief theatre game to emphasize their view. Ideas are seized, examined, expanded or discarded.

This is a rehearsal in progress at the Khan Theater in Jerusalem. The play, as yet, has no name. Nor does it have a set, costumes or lighting. In fact, it doesn't even have a script. But the core ensemble of 22 actors, led by playwright and artistic director Michael Gurevich, are implementing, once again, the prize-winning dramatic formula they have developed. Quite literally prize winning: they have won a string of awards – for direction, acting, translation, choreography, costume design and lighting and, most recently, Israel's prestigious Emet Prize.

The Khan Theater was once a 19th-century inn.

"Our rehearsals take longer than the traditional kind, but the creative teamwork we use is our path to new dramatic solutions," says Gurevich. "It's this which enables us to generate unique and vivid productions."

Their unorthodox approach fits seamlessly with the Khan Theater's unorthodox setting. Its permanent stage is an early 19th-century inn, which was successively used as a beer cellar, a carpentry workshop and an ammunitions dump. Surviving both the Jordanian guns of June 1967 and scheduled demolition thereafter, it was renovated into Jerusalem's only creative repertory theatre, the first significant cultural project of then-mayor Teddy Kollek's newly formed Jerusalem Foundation.

"The Khan is now celebrating its 40th anniversary – as, of course, is the foundation," says Yaki Har-Tal, today director of the Khan and previously, for 25 years, deputy director of the Jerusalem Foundation. "Its reputation is as one of the best theatres in Israel, consistently producing thought-provoking and high-quality performances."

Restoring the crumbling Khan of 1967 fitted with Teddy Kollek's vision of giving new cultural content to Jerusalem's ancient buildings. With money from the Gestetner Family Fund, the old inn was renovated into a modern theatre. Its picturesque arches and courtyards were preserved, while 230 seats and the computerized sound-and-light systems of a modern theatre were inconspicuously added.

The restored building, according to Har-Tal, has helped create a theatre-going experience for Jerusalemites characterized by direct contact with the audience and interaction with the community. "There's a unique and intimate atmosphere between audience and acting ensemble at the Khan," he says. "The physical setting and the close bonds between director, playwright and actors combine into a personal and direct relationship with audiences."

Audiences comprise most groups from Jerusalem's confusion of cultures, and with the help of the Jerusalem Foundation, the theatre also reaches out to specific populations.

"We subsidize workshops, theatre days and performances for schools, for the elderly and for special needs populations," says Danny Mimran, Jerusalem Foundation director and a member of the Khan's board. "We also support lectures, workshops, poetry readings, seminars, panel discussions and meetings with playwrights and actors for the public. In this way, the Khan brings the community closer to the theatre world and to the messages of its plays. We're delighted that it has become not only one of the highest quality theatres in Israel, but also a community institution as well."

If there has long been cause for pleasure on the artistic level, the economic level, too, is at last providing the same. Long plagued by financial problems, the Khan has for the past four years balanced its budget for the first time since its opening 40 years ago, Har-Tal explains with obvious satisfaction.

"As much as the theatre was known for acclaimed productions, it was also known for its debts," he says. "In the past few years, however, we've found the right balance between the size of the company (18 to 22 actors), the number of annual productions (three or four) and the economic potential of our public."

While the theatre won't descend from the economic knife edge until it clears its debts in four years time, it's now generating an annual surplus with which to pay off the accumulated deficit. "While commercial considerations take second place to the artistic in our productions, we're obviously happy when they can be combined, and when we have a lucrative hit on our hands – as we've had this year with The Winners," says Har-Tal.

The popularity of The Winners, a satire co-adapted by Gurevich, was unexpected. It is itself about an impoverished theatre that has experienced countless financial flops and decides it is time for a hit that will earn money and popularity. For its comeback, the theatre plans a musical about Israel.

Another acclaimed Khan production is the Town of the Little People, based on a collection of Sholem Aleichem's stories. Its theme is social and national displacement, exile and bereavement, as it examines the remembering and forgetting of Jewish culture that is first destroyed in the Holocaust and then buried with the realization of Zionism.

Plays like these are performed at the Khan alongside works by Agnon and Shakespeare, Jean Anouilh and Howard Barker, as well as original Israeli works (some written especially for the company) and plays by Ibsen, Chekhov and Pirandello. Gurevitch writes many of the Khan productions and selects all those performed, giving each the Khan ensemble's individual spin.

"We're a different kind of theatre," he says. "We maintain our own particular identity. This is expressed in what we perform and how we perform it."

Tribute to Israel

40 Years Jerusalem United

Hershfield spent the first part of the program at an ulpan and then at Hebrew University studying Israeli literature, biblical art and the Holocaust. When I met her in March, she had spent one month at the absorption centre.

Marlee Hirshfield

“I grew up in a very secular house,” she said. “I wanted to explore what it was like to be Jewish. My mother pushed me to go on this program. It was a good opportunity to explore my Jewishness.”

At the absorption centre, Hershfield works in the elementary school helping with physical education classes. “I also work out of an old age home, talking to the residents, helping them wash after dinner and playing games with them. It’s somewhat sad,” she said.

In addition to learning about Israel, its society and its culture, Hershfield is picking up some necessary life lessons living away from home. “I’ve been doing my own laundry and my own cooking. Plus we have to learn how to budget our money,” she said.

Hershfield plans to attend McGill in Montreal next September and study Jewish and religious studies. She said the Nativ program has been very rewarding, and she probably wouldn’t have been able to afford it without MASA’s help.

“It’s been a fascinating experience overall,” she said, “especially meeting the immigrants here. I do miss my family though, and the language barrier is sometimes tough.”

She is hoping she won’t lose some of the spiritual vibes she’s picked up from the program. “I want to go home and show my friends how important it is to keep in touch with your Judaism. I want to observe Shabbat and go to weekly services.”

Kathryn Rubin-Goodman, 20, Dustin Koffler, 24, and Ari Wexler, 23, of Toronto and David Oppenheim, 20, of Calgary are participants in the Interdisciplinary Center (IDC), Herzliya – the Raphael Recanati International School program. It is the only academic institution in Israel that offers fully accredited, internationally recognized bachelor degrees (in government, diplomacy and strategy; business administration; and computer science) taught entirely in English for students from around the world.

Koffler is studying business administration. He was previously enrolled in the Tel Aviv overseas program before switching over to IDC. He liked what he heard about it and said it had a sense of “around the world” on campus and provided a feeling of community that he didn’t get anywhere else in Israel.

Rubin-Goodman, a former McGill student, felt there was something missing. She’d been to Israel every year since she was 14 and decided to give it a try. That she could study in English was a definite “pull factor.”

Wexler, who has lived in Israel for six years, is in his second year of studying business. “This is the perfect place because I have the opportunity to be in Israel and am able to study in English. It’s everything,” he said.

For Oppenheim, it was just a “good opportunity at the right time.” He is living in the university-sponsored apartments, with a Swede, a Brazilian and a New Yorker.

MASA application forms and information are available online. Visit www.masaisrael.org or call 1-866-864-3279.

Renowned Toronto photographer Beverley Abramson was in Jerusalem earlier this year as a guest of the Jerusalem Foundation. She walked with her camera through the streets, alleyways, squares, playgrounds and coffee shops of the city. This is a small sampling of the photos she took, which she calls "In Harmony." They reflect selected glints and sparks of the compelling and always poignant diversity of life that pulsates through the beautiful ancient-modern city. Photographs from her most recent work in Israel will be on exhibit in October at the Jerusalem Centre for the Performing Arts and at Mishkenot Sha'ananim as part of the Jerusalem Foundation's celebration of the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

VE-Day in Jerusalem

Last week in Jerusalem, Russian-born Israeli veterans of World War II marked the 62nd anniversary of the victory in Europe – VE-Day. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert paid tribute in the Knesset to the 1.5 million Jewish fighters, soldiers and partisans who fought the Nazis. About 30,000 men and women in British Mandate Palestine fought with British forces against the Germans during the war. [Isranet photo]

Polish priest straddles Jewish and Christian worlds

It's not uncommon today for adoptive parents to tell their children at a fairly young age that they are adopted.

Of course, that's not the case every time or in every country.

Take Father Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel for instance. Born in 1943 in Nazi-occupied Europe, he grew up in a Roman Catholic home in Poland, well-loved and secure in his identity. Seeking to attain a more spiritual life, he entered a theological seminary at 17 – against his father's wishes – and was a priest for 12 years before he learned, at age 35, who his biological parents were.

That was on Feb. 23, 1978, and it's a date he considers his second birthday. It was then that his mother told him what she had withheld from him all those years – that he had been born in the small Lithuanian town of Swieciany, near Vilnius, to Jewish parents. His mother didn't know their names, only that they had another child, a four-year-old boy named Samuel, and that his birth mother was desperate to save her newborn son from death at the hands of the Nazis.

It was a life-altering moment for Father Weksler-Waszkinel, made all the more incredible by the pleas his Jewish mother made to his Polish mother, Emily, who herself was on the run from the Nazis. "She said, 'You are Christian. You believe in Jesus Christ. He was a Jew. Save my son in the name of the person you

Condolences Sent

OTTAWA — Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, sent condolences last week to family and friends of Cpl. Benoit Chevalier, the lone Canadian peacekeeper among nine members of the Multinational Force and Observers who died in a May 6 plane crash in the Sinai Peninsula. Baker expressed gratitude to the force. "There are several different types of soldiers in the world, but the one who chooses to become a peacekeeper is a special breed," he said.

York U Settles Suit

TORONTO — York University settled a lawsuit earlier this month by a student who was suspended for his role in two noisy anti-Israel protests. Daniel Freeman-Maloy was suspended for three years in 2004 for using a megaphone during two indoor anti-Israel protests on campus while classes were in session. York withdrew the suspension after three months, and Freeman-Maloy, 24, sued York president Lorna Marsden for $850,000, saying she defamed him and harmed his earning prospects. "The terms of the settlement of the lawsuit, which are mutually satisfactory, are confidential," York said in a May 3 statement. Freeman-Maloy will be a graduate student in political science at York this fall.

Jewish Vets Honoured

VICTORIA — B.C. Lieut.-Gov. Iona Campagnolo and Victoria Mayor Alan Lowe attended a May 8 ceremony at Victoria's Congregation Emanu-el to honour Jewish Canadian World War II veterans on the 62nd anniversary of V-E Day, the end of the war in Europe. More than 200 people attended the event, and Lowe declared May 8 to be "Honouring Jewish Veterans of World War II Day" in Victoria.

WORLD

Israeli Lands In Iran

TEHRAN — An Israeli businessman became a guest of Iran after his flight made an emergency landing. Benny Medvediev spent a day in Tehran earlier this month after the plane he was flying on from Turkey to India landed because of technical problems. The crew wouldn't let him wait on the plane, so he had to disembark with the other passengers. He said Iranian officials treated him well despite his nationality. He was the sole Israeli among the group, which also included a Jewish couple from Britain. "For the first hour, I was scared to death," he told Yediot Achronot May 6. "But soon enough I realized that Iranians do not have horns. They were really wonderful to me and even invited me to return to Tehran. I told them, 'Come on, let's make peace and I'll invite you to Jerusalem.'" After a day's wait at Tehran's airport, the passengers reboarded the plane and flew to Mumbai.

KLM-Nazi Link Cited

AMSTERDAM — A Dutch film claims that KLM Airlines helped Nazis without legal travel papers escape to Argentina via Switzerland after World War II. The documentary, which aired this month on Dutch TV, cited documents it says came from U.S., Swiss, Argentine and Dutch archives. The former state airline, now part of Air France, said its own checks didn't reveal such evidence, and it will likely seek an impartial probe into the matter.

Lauder May Run For WJC President

NEW YORK — Ronald Lauder moved to clear the way for a possible run for World Jewish Congress president.

On May 8, the cosmetic mogul's lawyer sent a letter to the WJC's American section warning that the selection process must be in accordance with WJC bylaws. Lauder, a former WJC treasurer, is president of the Jewish National Fund and an ex-president of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations.

Edgar Bronfman, WJC president for nearly 30 years, resigned May 7 at a WJC steering committee meeting, capping weeks of turmoil following the firing of Rabbi Israel Singer, a longtime senior WJC official, in March.

Founded in Geneva in 1936, the WJC is the umbrella group for more than 100 local communities. It had been under a cloud since the revelation several years ago that Rabbi Singer secretly transferred $1.2 million (US) of WJC money to a Swiss bank account. The cash was later returned, but critics say the transfer was never fully explained. A 2006 report by the New York State Attorney General's Office found no evidence of criminality, but it criticized the group for lax record-keeping and said Rabbi Singer violated his fiduciary duties by moving money around without proper authorization.

Bronfman declined interview requests last week. But his associate, WJC secretary general Stephen Herbits, said Bronfman left because the issue with Rabbi Singer had been resolved. "Bronfman has been trying to leave for six years. Now he is free to retire because the matter with Singer is closed," Herbits told JTA.

Suspect Transferred

SAN FRANCISCO — A New Jersey man who allegedly assaulted Holocaust survivor, writer and Nobel Peace Prize winner Elie Wiesel flew to San Francisco to face charges. City police picked up Eric Hunt on May 10 from a jail in Somerville N.J., where he was being held. His charges include attempted kidnapping, false imprisonment, elder abuse, stalking, battery and the commission of a hate crime. Hunt, 22, allegedly posed as a journalist to accost Wiesel, 78, at a peace forum at a San Francisco Hotel on Feb. 1. He was arrested Feb. 17 after allegedly boasting about the assault on a Holocaust denial blog.

Service Denied

BALTIMORE — A Maryland food co-op apologized after a pro-Israel student was refused service. In late April, a cashier at the Maryland Food Collective told the student that her "I Stand With Israel" T-shirt was offensive and refused to serve her, according to the University of Maryland's student newspaper. Another worker helped her, but she left the store "emotionally distraught," said Avi Mayer, president of the Pro-Israel Terrapin Alliance. Jewish students attended the collective's weekly meeting April 30, where workers asserted their right to deny service to anyone they chose. However, one worker said the co-op's policy on service will be reviewed.

USDS Vaughan move to be delayed, modified

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

United Synagogue Day School has postponed its plans to open a new branch at the Lebovic community campus in Vaughan in September 2008. Instead, it will likely open in 2009 with a scaled-down version of the original planned school.

The plans to open in 2009 are "as definite as one can ever be" when talking about buildings that are not yet built, said Wendy Bellack-Viner, president of the school's board of directors.

As recently as last June, USDS "committed that all students will be able to attend classes at the new campus" in September 2008, according to an article on UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's website.

Parents were initially notified of the delay in a Feb. 6 letter to USDS parents and staff written by Bellack-Viner and Brian Klar, executive vice-president and chair of the board of directors. The letter, which was followed by a town-hall meeting in March, was sent to parents so they would have the information before the deadline for re-registration, said Bellack-Viner.

In it, they wrote that the board "remains fully committed to the project," but that it is not feasible to open in 2008. They cited challenges "including municipal approvals, capital fundraising, construction schedules, and the financial feasibility of operating a full complement of classes from kindergarten to Grade 8."

One possibility, the letter stated, is to open with initial classes in preschool and Grade 1 only, with subsequent grades being added each year.

"Our aim is to open with as many grades as possible," Bellack-Viner told The CJN.

On a question-and-answer page that was distributed by the board of directors at the March meeting, the reason for the delay was said to be that "it does not appear that capital fundraising targets could be met within the necessary time frame."

Beit Rayim Synagogue, the school's partner on the campus, is planning to open in spring 2009, said Bellack-Viner. The congregation rented space at USDS's Richmond Hill branch from 1993 until it was sold last year, and is now in temporary premises.

USDS currently has two campuses, one at Beth Tikvah Synagogue on Bayview Avenue, and the other at Beth Tzedec Congregation on Bathurst Street south of Eglinton Avenue The third campus in Richmond Hill was closed in 2006, and 136 students – about two-thirds of those who were not graduating – transferred to the Bayview campus, presumably on a temporary basis.

Bellack-Viner, interviewed last month, said that fundraising would begin soon and that the school was still in the process of assessing its financial needs.

"There were some people who were understandably very frustrated and disappointed" by the delay, said Bellack-Viner, who apologized to parents on behalf of the board at the March meeting. She also emphasized the importance of the school being "open" with parents and urged families who live in the northern areas to become involved in the school's plans.

A second meeting was in the works for this week, said Bellack-Viner. The agenda will focus largely on fundraising, but she said it was too early to say how much the school needs.

Some "who were upset have come forward and said they were going to stay with USDS," she said. "That's very encouraging. We really see them as the future of the community."

Among them is Rich Dlin, the father of two children, one in Grade 4 and one in senior kindergarten. Both his children attended the Richmond Hill campus.

"We thought about not moving them [to the Bayview branch]," said Dlin, speaking for himself and his wife Marla.

They chose to remain with USDS because it best matched their own philosophy and their children could remain with the friends they had made.

"Many Richmond Hill families felt betrayed – myself included," Dlin told The CJN in an e-mail that elaborated on what he had said in a phone interview. Many of them "were prepared to leave USDS – not only because shifting our children to the Bayview campus would result in an extra 60 minutes or more of travel time per day, but also out of extreme anger and frustration."

Failing to connect the dots

From the editor's desk

At one time or another, when we were young, most of us played a connect-the-dots game.

It wasn't an especially exciting game. But it taught us how to follow the natural path of our curiosity. It also taught us to withhold forming conclusions until most, if not all, of the relevant information was at hand. The image of the drawing on the page would emerge only in relation to the number of the dots we had connected. The more dots we joined, the truer the image we saw.

The lessons we learned instinctively as youngsters after we saw the importance of connecting all the dots seem to have been forgotten by many of the journalists who write about Israel and its conflict with the Palestinian Authority. They ignore the dots, let alone try to connect them, before drawing their negative conclusions about Israel.

A case in point was coverage last week, in some papers, of the economic crisis confronting the Palestinians. The trigger for the stories was the release of a report by the World Bank that criticized Israeli restrictions on Palestinian movement in the West Bank.

As reported by the JTA, World Bank official David Craig said that the security fence and military crackdowns against Palestinian terrorism had effectively broken up the West Bank into 10 enclaves. "Palestinian economic revival is predicated on an integrated economic entity with freedom of movement between the West Bank and Gaza and within the West Bank," he said.

Picking up on the World Bank's report, Globe and Mail reporter Carolynne Wheeler, in an article ostensibly about the financial hardships suffered by Palestinian Authority employees and their families wrote: "Heavy checkpoints and permit systems inside the West Bank, imposed by Israel in the name of its citizens' security (my emphasis) also limit the PA's ability to raise money through the local economy."

It may be hyper-sensitivity on my part, but I cannot avoid feeling that Wheeler writes the words "in the name of its citizens' security," virtually sneering them onto the page, begrudgingly, as a concession to journalistic canon, but disbelieving that there might be any truth in them.

The "dot" the World Bank and Wheeler appear content to disregard or at least significantly discount is the terrorism that the Palestinian leadership unceasingly encourages and attempts to export into Israel.

It is the commitment by the Palestinian government and a large sector of Palestinian society to the murder of Israelis that necessitates the "heavy checkpoints and permit systems inside the West Bank." Were Israel still in control of the Gaza Strip, the checkpoints and permit systems would undoubtedly be imposed there as well.

It is not surprising that a society ruled by a government that steadfastly refuses to recognize the legitimacy of its neighbour and that abjectly refuses to abandon the use of violence and terror against it will become a twisted construct of perverse priorities, focused more on bringing down its neighbour rather than on building up its own territory.

Is it any wonder then, that an officially sanctioned collective agenda of "let's annihilate our neighbours" would produce childrens' television programming such as Farfur, the Mickey Mouse clone, whose enlightened message to his young viewers is hatred and contempt for Jews and Israelis? (See "According to Reports" in this issue.)

In the heyday of "Oslo," before former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat let loose his strategy of suicide terror, the Palestinian economy boomed. Palestinian commerce and industry were in a state of constant expansion.

But after the launch of the terror war against it, as a measure of self-defence, Israel implemented the checkpoints, the permit system and then, as a final, sad concession to the intractability of certain Palestinian leaders' true intentions toward the Jewish state, it built the security fence.

Every other state in the world, caught in a similar situation, would have reacted at least the same way as Israel. Many others would have been far harsher and far more radical in dealing with the constant, mortal threat to its people.

Should the Palestinian ruling class not be held accountable at all for the pitiful condition of the society they lead?

Where are the billions of dollars stolen and misappropriated by the previous, Arafat-led, generation of leaders in the bloom days of Oslo?

Israel's Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh tried to connect the dots for the World Bank spokesperson. He reminded Israel's critics of two key points:

- The World Bank vastly overstated the number of roadblocks in the West Bank by using data of the United Nations Office for the Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs.
- What is making the life of Palestinians in the West Bank difficult is terrorism, not Israel.

If, as youngsters, we would have behaved as so many modern journalists behave today, we would have never seen the full, true picture.

Alas, neither do they. – MBD

Lebanon war a wakeup call for Israel, analyst says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Last summer's war in Lebanon, the second since 1982, was both a failure and a wakeup call for Israel, Israeli analyst Gabriel Ben-Dor said last week.

Speaking at Holy Blossom Temple, he charged that Israel entered the war, its longest since 1948, "badly prepared."

Nor did Israel conduct the war with a systematic plan or its customary decisiveness and aggressiveness, said the Haifa University political scientist as he delivered the first of two annual Harry Posen Memorial Lectures.

The Israeli chief of staff and the defence minister should have known that the primary threat to Israel's security was posed by a "northeast triangle" composed of Hezbollah and its allies, Iran and Syria, and that Israel should have taken military steps to "dismantle" it.

Ben-Dor, and director of Haifa University's National Security Study Centre, disclosed that he and several colleagues submitted a paper on this potentially dangerous situation to the chief of staff and defence minister about six months before the outbreak of the war in mid-July, but it was ignored.

Suggesting that Israel is no longer complacent about Hezbollah's capabilities, Ben-Dor said the Israel Defence Force needs to be reformed with respect to doctrine, personnel, training and acquisition of state-of-the-art technology.

"The IDF has to be reformed, retrained and revived in spirit," he said. "Major changes have to be introduced."

In the future, Israel will be required to have access to better intelligence data, a more efficient anti-missile system, a better integrated land force and a bigger defence budget, he added.

Expressing anger and disappointment over the way Israel's leadership managed the war, Ben-Dor ripped into Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, whose performance was recently castigated by the Winograd Commission.

Olmert, Peretz should resign immediately, says Ben-Dor

Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz should be held accountable and resign immediately. "They should go! A failure of this kind should not be forgiven."

Saving his greatest scorn for Olmert, Ben-Dor said that he is part of the problem and not the solution. "He should not be cleaning up his mess."

He called for a national unity government led by Shimon Peres, currently the deputy prime minister. He also recommended that the new defence and finance ministers should be Ehud Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu. Barak, the former prime minister, is a Labor party leadership contender, while Netanyahu, also an ex-prime minister, is leader of the Likud party.

In an analysis of the war, Ben-Dor said Israel had no reason to be surprised by the war, since Hezbollah had amassed a stockpile of 13,500 Iranian and Syrian rockets aimed at the Galilee.

Israel declared war hastily, carried out operations slowly, relied too much on air power, had no clear objectives and underestimated Hezbollah, he observed.

In addition, he said Israel should have committed more army divisions to the major land offensive it launched in the last three days of the conflict and should have moved to the Litani River faster so as to isolate Hezbollah fighters.

Pronouncing the war a failure from Israel's point of view, Ben-Dor pointed out that Israel failed to crush Hezbollah, as Olmert had promised, nor did Israel obtain the release of the two soldiers abducted by Hezbollah.

At best, he said, the war was a draw. "Psychologically, maybe we lost."

According to Ben-Dor, Israel's elite never really came to terms with the fact Israel was at war. "You might say we blew it. We did not win. We could have won."

Israel, having concentrated its military efforts on combating Palestinian terrorism in the West Bank and Gaza, was not ready for the kind of war imposed by Hezbollah.

Even on the last day of the war, Hezbollah gunners managed to fire more than 200 missiles into Israel, he said.

In short, Israel failed to deter Hezbollah, notwithstanding an admission after the war by its secretary general, Hassan Nasrallah, that he would not have started it had he known that Israel would respond so ferociously.

Iran may have encouraged Hezbollah to launch hostilities to shift attention away from its controversial nuclear program, he noted.

Ben-Dor said that Israel's policy of unilateral disengagement from the territories, as originally formulated by former prime minister Ariel Sharon, is as good as dead due to the "intransigence" of Hamas and Hezbollah. Neither Hamas nor Hezbollah wants a peaceful accommodation with Israel.

Ben-Dor said that the focus of Israel's concerns should be on weak Arab states rather than strong ones.

Weak states, such as Lebanon, tolerate armed militias like Hezbollah. Similarly, the weak and divided Palestinian Authority fosters extremism.

‘My message is to be grateful to the Jewish people’ believe in and when he grows up, he will become a priest.’”

“My mother couldn’t refuse,” Father Weksler-Waszkinel said through an interpreter. “It would have meant refusing Christ, denying her own faith.”

She agreed to take the infant and in 1945, she, her husband, Peter, and Romuald moved back to Poland to avoid living under the Soviets.

Today, Father Weksler-Waszkinel is a professor at the University of Lublin in Poland and he travels the world telling his story and appealing for tolerance. He was in Toronto last week as a guest of the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada. During his visit, he spoke at the John Paul II Polish Cultural Centre and at St. Michael’s College, where his address examined Vatican II and its teachings about Jews and Judaism.

As a man who straddles two worlds, Father Weksler-Waszkinel believes “my role is to show the deep roots of the Catholic Church. These deep roots are Judaism.

“My message is to be grateful to the Jewish people for the roots of the Christian religion.”

A disciple of the late Pope, John Paul II, Father Weksler-Waszkinel echoes his mentor’s message about Jews: “If you meet Christ, you meet Judaism, so there should be gratitude. For centuries, there had been accusations that Jews murdered Christ, that God rejected Jews and that Christians had taken over the role of Jews. These were big errors,” he said.

“In the 19th century, they poisoned the climate of Christianity, and when Hitler started to proclaim his hatred of the Jews, he was able to collect [on] this hatred. Christianity has to be aware of its own sin and responsibility. This was the message of John Paul II. I am his disciple and it is obvious to me that that is my mission. It is the need of my heart.”

> ‘My role is to show the deep roots of the Catholic Church. These deep roots are Judaism’

More than just his disciple, Father Weksler-Waszkinel studied under Karol Wojtyla in seminary and considers the late Pope his mentor. When he first learned of his Jewish roots, he wrote a letter to the Pope telling his story but asking him to keep it secret. “The Pope responded in a beautiful letter that started ‘My beloved brother,’ and saying he would pray for my Jewish parents.”

It took 14 years for Father Weksler-Waszkinel to learn their identities.

While listening to the confession of a nun, he comforted her by saying one shouldn’t be afraid and that he himself had been saved five minutes before midnight.

Afterwards, the sister offered her help. She had saved many Jewish children during the Holocaust and asked – in reference to his statement of avoiding death – whether he was a Jewish child.

“I started to cry. I didn’t know anything about my Jewish parents,” except that his father was a tailor kept left alive after the first wave of killings because he performed a task deemed useful by the Nazis, he said.

The nun began contacting friends in Israel, and in 1992, she met a group of Jewish survivors from the Lithuanian town where Father Weksler-Waszkinel was born. The survivors immediately recognized his father as Yankele (Jacob) Weksler, who had a son named Samuel. They opened a memorial book of the town and there was a picture of his mother, Batia, who was described as the president of the local Zionist society.

He learned that his mother and Samuel had likely been sent to Sobibor in late 1943, where they were killed. His father survived a little longer in Riga, where he was sent for forced labour. He is believed to have met his end at another Nazi camp, Stutthof.

With his family name in hand, Father Weksler-Waszkinel embarked on a visit to Israel, where he met his uncle, Zvi Weksler, and an aunt. His uncle recognized him immediately as he walked in the terminal. “How do you know me?” Father Weksler-Waszkinel asked.

Back in Poland, Father Weksler-Waszkinel wrote another letter to Pope John Paul II, telling him his story was no longer secret and asking whether he could add the names “Weksler” and “Jakub” (for Yankele) to his baptismal names in honour of his Jewish parents. He received a letter in response addressed to Father Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel, the name he goes by today.

Ironically, his father, Peter, had opposed his choice of the priesthood. He learned from his mother that it disturbed him greatly and he took it hard. Peter recalled Batia’s pleas, but “he did not want the burden of being a Catholic priest [placed] on a Jewish child,” Father Weksler-Waszkinel said.

His father died of a heart attack at age 52 while Romuald was enrolled in the seminary. It almost prompted him to withdraw, but on further consideration, he decided to remain. “I though his death paid for the time in the seminary. Maybe it was a sign for me to stay.”

Father Weksler-Waszkinel knows that some Poles today don’t consider him a proper Catholic and some Jews don’t view him as really Jewish.

“I consider myself from Jesus’ synagogue. Jesus is my rabbi. He was a Jew, so I say I am a Jew from Jesus and I would like to love Jews as much as he loved them.”

United behind an undivided capital

On the eve of the 40th anniversary this week of Yom Yerushalayim, the reunification of Jerusalem, the widely respected Jerusalem Institute for Israel Studies released a poll conducted for it by the Tazpit Research Institute concerning Israelis' attitudes to Jerusalem.

The results were quite staggering and gratifying.

As reported in Ha'aretz, an overwhelming 96 per cent of Israeli Jews are against relinquishing the Western Wall, even in exchange for lasting peace and ending the dispute over Jerusalem. Equally eye-opening, some 89 per cent of Israeli Jews are unwilling to give up the Temple Mount in exchange for the promise of lasting peace and ending the dispute with the Palestinians.

These results lead to two very important observations.

First: Most Israeli Jews simply no longer believe that territorial concessions in Jerusalem would in fact bring peace with the Palestinians. Some 44 per cent of Israeli Jews were far more willing to give up the Arab neighborhoods of East Jerusalem, as long as Israel retained the Western Wall and the Jewish Quarter. Sadly, 76 per cent believe peace is unattainable. Only 20 per cent said they believed peace could be reached in return for territorial concessions in Jerusalem. This belief was undoubtedly fashioned out of the recent experiences of unilateral Israeli withdrawal from south Lebanon and the Gaza Strip.

Second: Even in the hearts of the least observant, Jerusalem ignites a kindling that is very deep in the Jewish soul.

It was against the background of the release of the poll's findings that the ambassadors from the United States and the European Union announced that they would not attend the special Knesset celebrations to mark the 40th anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification.

The EU and the United States regard east Jerusalem to be "occupied" or at least, "disputed" territory whose future will have to be determined in negotiations between Israel and the Palestinians.

The spokesperson for the EU delegation in Jerusalem said the decision to avoid the events celebrating the reunification of Jerusalem "is not only the position of the EU, but of broad sections of the international community, and is in line with our position regarding the Palestinian-Israeli conflict."

And so, the EU missed yet another opportunity to affirm values of integrity over expediency and to ground its Middle East policy in the reality of the vibrant, united city and in the honesty of its irrefutable history and connection to the Jewish state.

It is the people of Israel – and the Jews around the world – who confirm "legitimacy" on Jerusalem as the united capital of Israel. The notion has its roots in the soil of collective Jewish yearning for more than 2,000 years. And it is impermeable to the diplomatic distortions in which the EU and United States find themselves, in craven deference to the Arab regimes.

25 years ago in The CJN

Talks between Egypt and Israel on self-rule for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza were stymied by Egypt's refusal to meet in Jerusalem. Previous talks had been held near Cairo, in Washington and in Tel Aviv. The talks were assumed to be leading to an independent Palestinian state.

Nazis responsible for the Holocaust

The former chief rabbi of Israel, Mordechai Eliyahu, has opined that the Shoah was the result of what Jews did, and not the Nazis ("Former chief rabbi accused of Holocaust slander," CJN, April 26). Specifically, he remarked that the Shoah was God's punishment to the Jews for the development of Reform Judaism. In particular, Rabbi Eliyahu noted that Germany was the birthplace of both Reform Judaism and Nazism. He argued that this was no coincidence.

Jewish communities throughout the world are engaged in a serious battle to disarm those who argue that the Holocaust never happened, or that it was far less serious than it actually was. But we also need to ensure that theologically the people to blame for the horrific, numbing crime of the Holocaust are its true and real perpetrators – the Nazis. To suggest that Reform Jews or Reform Judaism are responsible for the Holocaust is in essence to absolve the Nazis of their crime. This cannot be permitted, or done. The Nazis were the criminals, and the Shoah is their crime, and their crime alone.

PESACH
SHAVUOT

The Toronto Board of Rabbis affirms in an unequivocal voice the idea of Kol Yisrael areivim zeh lazeh – that all Jews share a bond, and that our common history, our shared values and our love of the Jewish nation bind us with affinity and love to each other. This does not mean that we need to agree on all things, but it does mean that we need to respect, tolerate and never demonize one another. In truth, the only lesson to come from the Shoah is that there is no lesson to be learned – it is a horror far too large to provide one. In the face of such massive inhumanity, we stand to answer with only silence, and determination to continue and never to cease.

Toronto is not all of Canada

I was disappointed that no attempt was made to ascertain the opinions of Conservative rabbis west of the Manitoba/Ontario border, or east of the Quebec/New Brunswick border in the article "Local rabbis decry JTS move to admit gays" (CJN, April 5). Nor did you seek out local non-rabbinic opinions in Toronto, which might have differed from this view. Had you done so, you might have discovered a more balanced view, and you certainly would have discovered that the Toronto rabbis do not necessarily speak for all Canadian rabbis or all Canadian conservative Jews. This Canadian conservative Jew, for one, applauds the decision.

Although there are issues unique to the Canadian congregations in the Conservative movement, they are not going to be solved by forming a separate Canadian Conservative movement, as suggested by Rabbi Steven Saltzman and Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl. One of those issues is the small number of congregations relative to the physical size of the country. How would it help to contract into our own little shell without the wide resources of the United Synagogue or its rabbinical and cantorial assemblies?

Canadian Conservative Jews make up almost 30 congregations from Victoria, B.C, to Halifax, N.S. It would be very interesting to know how many of these congregations and their rabbis agree or disagree with the views of the Toronto rabbis on that one issue.

CJC and day school funding

Seeking $15 million grants from the provincial government may not stop UJA Federation and CJC from advocating for fair funding for faith-based schools, as claimed by federation spokesperson Howard English, but it clearly dampens their willingness to support the kind of grassroots political action that is needed if such funding is to become a reality ("Ontario gives UJA Federation $15 million grant for new JCCs," CJN, May 10).

One can see this clearly by comparing the CJC website, www.fundingfairness.ca, on this issue with the website of Parents for Equality in Education Funding (PEEF), www.equalfunding.org, an independent grassroots advocacy organization dedicated to this issue. The CJC website does not use the word "discrimination" even once, and does not refer to the United Nations decision that found that Ontario's current official religious discrimination violates binding international human rights law. Unlike the PEEF website, the CJC website does not set out any concrete grassroots activities that members of the community can take to advance the fair funding cause.

CJC and federation do a lot of good work for the community. They need to be honest, however, about the limitations that this creates and work co-operatively with organizations such as PEEF, which is dedicated solely and without compromise to taking the political action needed to obtain fair funding.

The European Union must act in Darfur

Israelis protested two weeks ago in Tel Aviv against the genocide in Darfur. [Israel Sun photo]

For four years, violence and terror have ruled in Darfur. After many futile efforts, the European Union must get tough with the perpetrators.

Joschka Fischer

Darfur is a humanitarian catastrophe: more than 200,000 dead, thousands raped and tortured, and 2.6 million people displaced, owing to the Sudanese government's war against its own people. Originally an anti-insurgency effort, the campaign quickly mutated into a killing and expulsion operation. Sudan's government has been recruiting and paying the local Janjaweed militiamen, who have attacked hundreds of defenceless villages and towns, often in close co-ordination with the Sudanese air force.

The consequences are devastating. Roughly a third of Darfur's population has been forced from their homes and are now in displaced persons camps inside Sudan, where they remain subject to the Janjaweed terror, or in equally vulnerable refugee settlements in Chad. International humanitarian efforts to help those in Sudan are hampered by Sudanese government harassment and pointless bureaucratic hassles. Even if the aid arrives, the point, to quote one senior UN official, seems to be "keeping people alive with our humanitarian assistance until they are massacred."

Darfur demands consistent and firm international action. We all bear responsibility to help the displaced return to their homes. In the last three years, the UN Security Council has passed 10 resolutions requiring the Sudanese government to change course and fulfil its obligation to protect its own people. These include a demand from the Security Council to disarm the Janjaweed. Yet the Sudanese government never follows through on its repeated promises to do so.

In November 2004, a peaceful solution was within reach, when the government and rebels signed a ceasefire and humanitarian agreement. For a short moment, there was reason to hope that peace was at hand. A Security Council resolution and international negotiation efforts had paved the way to end the 20-year war in southern Sudan – a breakthrough that in fact led to a deal signed by the government and southern rebels in January 2005. At that time, it appeared that a similar breakthrough in western Sudan would follow.

But the worst was yet to come. After an apparent lull in aerial bombardments, the planes soon returned, and the Janjaweed resumed their campaign of murder and destruction. The next round of peace negotiations, which opened in December 2004, stalled because the government launched a military offensive just as they started, in defiance of the ceasefire. This behaviour is symptomatic of the lack of respect Sudan's government has shown towards its obligations.

A Security Council resolution last August mandated a 20,300-strong UN peacekeeping force to replace the small and overwhelmed African Union (AU) mission currently on the ground. Not surprisingly, the government in Khartoum rejected the idea. Subsequent negotiations led to a compromise agreement in November for a hybrid AU-UN force that would deploy in three stages. Talks continue to this day, but despite the occasional newspaper headline announcing a deal, the Sudanese government has been using every opportunity to delay or to attempt to add conditions to the force's mandate. The result is that the second phase of the deployment has still not taken place, even though it was accepted by Khartoum six months ago.

'Target the Sudanese government where it hurts most'

The heart of the matter is this: the Sudanese government is either unable or unwilling to protect its own citizens from mass violence. In accordance with the "responsibility to protect" doctrine, adopted unanimously by heads of state and government at the UN World Summit in September 2005, if a state fails to meet this primary obligation, responsibility shifts to the international community, which may exercise various measures, including, if absolutely necessary, military force.

But military intervention in Darfur without the Sudanese government's consent is not an option today. Not only is there insufficient political will for an international force, but, more importantly, there are valid doubts about the feasibility and prospects for the success of such an operation.

Even so, the international community still has options. Although it would be best if these options were adopted by the UN Security Council, the EU itself can and must act to increase the costs to the Sudanese government of its continued obstruction of aid deliveries and its delaying tactics on the deployment of international peacekeepers.

That is why it is so important that EU foreign ministers heed the European Parliament's call for serious sanctions against the Sudanese government, whose key players were clearly identified by the UN Commission of Inquiry on Darfur and Panel of Experts on Darfur. The EU must freeze these individuals' assets and impose an EU-wide travel ban on them.

In addition, measures should target the Sudanese government where it hurts most: revenue and foreign investment inflows into Sudan's petroleum sector, and supply of goods and services to that and associated sectors. The EU and its member states' governments must enact legislation to ban companies based in their countries from direct involvement in Sudan's petroleum sector and in industries related to it.

Moreover, an investigation into the offshore accounts of Sudanese businesses affiliated with the National Congress Party, the ruling majority party in Khartoum, should be launched, paving the way for sanctions against the regime's commercial entities, which form the main conduit for financing its Janjaweed proxies in Darfur.

Such targeted sanctions would affect the power and privileges of the key players in this crisis. By imposing them, Europe would finally take a real step toward stopping the killing in Darfur and extending meaningful help to its people.

Exploring Inner Space is a book by David Hay that appeared more than a quarter of a century ago. Its emphasis is on a survey in which people were asked to describe themselves religiously (believer, agnostic, atheist, etc.) and then answer questions about their experiences of the divine. It turned out that self-definition and self-disclosure had little to do with each other. Agnostics and atheists testified almost as often to religious experiences as did believers.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

I thought of the book when reading about the survey of religious attitudes in Israel, conducted just before last Pesach by the mass circulation daily Yediot Achronot. Though 50 per cent of Israeli Jews describe themselves as secular, 85 per cent say they believe in God and only 12 per cent say they are atheists.

Almost two-thirds of Israeli Jews make Kiddush on Friday night and roughly the same number of families light Shabbat candles. Some 70 per cent will not partake of chametz during Pesach. Another poll indicated that nine out of 10 Israeli Jews attended a seder this year.

The statistics baffle Christian missionaries. They say they only wish to convert "secular" Jews but find among them no less resistance than among "religious" Jews. Christians tend to judge others by their own theology, which makes a fundamental distinction between religious and secular. Many fail to realize that it doesn't hold water in Judaism. Even those Jews who use it and describe themselves as secular are not really secular in the true meaning of the term.

Many "secular" Israelis attend prayer meetings on Sabbaths and festivals, as well as Torah study sessions, usually without the benefit of clergy, though sometimes non-Orthodox rabbis are invited to lead. Of late, there is even a secular yeshiva where traditional texts are studied seriously. It announced recently that it intends to ordain rabbis who would offer spiritual counselling and perform life-cycle events.

The notion of modern Israel as a society where the choice is between "nothing" (consistent non-observance and non-belief) and "everything" (all-embracing and often harsh Orthodoxy) is no longer true. What is happening in Israel today may be much more akin to the world of the Bible, where the seemingly secular and the ostensibly religious co-mingled. Modern Jews who have adopted a terminology borrowed from the non-Jewish world may find themselves more religious than they imagined. They are religious by surprise, as it were.

The reason for this religiosity is rooted both in the inner quest by sensitive souls and in the belief that Israel can only be a Jewish state if Jews, irrespective of how they label themselves, do traditional Jewish things.

God works in mysterious ways and mercifully disregards the artificial categories human beings create for themselves. Hallelujah!

Travel that's rewarding and lasting

At this time last year, I was manoeuvring around unpaved streets, conversing in alien dialects and exploring an exotic land. With beaches, jungles, deserts and savannahs, the West African nation of Ghana was my first foray into the African sub-continent. And what an adventure it was.

While I may have stuck out like a sore thumb, I eventually enjoyed the inquisitive glances and the constant chorus of voices calling obruni (white man) in my direction. Like many Canadian youths, I had chosen to travel internationally after my third year of university. Wanting a first-hand experience as opposed to the theoretical learning from university textbooks, I scoured the Internet for the best possible internship opportunity in the developing world, and eventually settled on an intern position at Channel R Radio in Accra, Ghana's bustling capital of three million. With the station's slogan "all gospel, all the time," it might seem an odd choice for a Jewish Canadian university student.

I quickly learned that Christianity is everything in Ghana, and there's no doubt about it. From barbershops named "God is Good Hair Salon" to restaurants named "Hand of God Cooking," the in-your-face religion in that society is surprisingly refreshing. Where many North Americans view organized religion as structured and outdated at times, religion in Ghana unifies impoverished people through a mélange of new-age spiritualism. In the same way, education is heralded as a beacon of opportunity rather than a system of standardized tests.

Jonah Bretman in Ottawa

While my internship position provided the opportunity to obtain hands-on radio station experience by scripting the international and African daily news updates, the prospect of engaging with a completely foreign culture was most exciting to me. Visiting slave castles in Cape Coast, I was reminded of a Holocaust remembrance trip I attended in Poland some years ago. While the connection to African slaves is less direct, yet when one stands in these contrasting chambers of death, intolerance and inhumanity seem eerily universal.

While the all-gospel radio station showed me the dominant Christian tradition of Ghana, I had heard that there was an oppressed minority of – that's right – Ghanaian Jews. Venturing far off the beaten path, I discovered a tiny community, complete with prayer books, a donated Torah and a newly constructed synagogue. The House of Israel community in Sefwi Wiawso has practised kashrut and observed Shabbat for many years. Spending a quiet Shabbat afternoon with these geographically remote people made me feel unexpectedly at home, as if our common Jewish experience was enough to lessen the distance of our connection.

Ultimately though, my travels taught me that while all people are hypothetically born the same, few receive as many opportunities as we Canadians do. Realizing this, one cannot help but think of the Jewish tradition of tzdakat tikkun olam, the giving of charity for the benefit of the world.

But charity seems so one-sided. Today's youth is often engaged more in cross-cultural experiences that provide equal benefit to locals and the travellers themselves. By the end of my trip last year, I truly believed I had learned more in six weeks of adventuring than in four years of studying.

"Backpacking with a purpose," as some call it, has become the travel option of choice for many students. By creating a lasting change in the communities they visit, they make the experience of travel much more rewarding and lasting.

As this column goes to print, I will be leading a dozen Canadian university students of all faiths in constructing an orphanage dormitory in Ghana's impoverished northern region. Through planned long-term initiatives such as bike eco-tourism, microloan financing, girls' scholarship funds and a water borehole for a well, we aim to create lasting change by empowering locals.

Our participants come from a computer-enlightened age where virtual advertising has spread our proactive message of horizontal development to thousands of people at the touch of a button. These are the tools at the fingertips of 21st-century do-gooders. I urge all students of the world, young and old, to seek out and explore.

To learn more and stay updated on our adventures, check out www.thelotuskids.org. Also check for my next two columns, which will be sent from Ghana, and wish me luck!

Goodbye, but hopefully not farewell

In just a few short days, I will be graduating and leaving Halifax, my university home for the past four years. While working for the school newspaper during my second year at King's, my roommate and I penned a piece titled, "Homeward Bound, I wish I was…" The article consisted of interviews with Halifax students who shared their thoughts about home. The general thrust of the article was that an essential part of going away to university is getting used to having two homes – the one where your family lives and the other that you are building for yourself.

The article was full of the existential angst common to many second-year students. My roommate and I were pained about the growing disconnect between Halifax and the respective communities we grew up in, while at the same time we knew this was part of the process of becoming more fully at home in this city.

Two years later, it's clear to me that when I walk the streets of Halifax, I'm treading through a city I call my own, more so than any other place in the world at the moment. Perhaps part of this is familiarity, but a big part is also my great affinity for the place where I have become an adult. Here I learned to make everyday decisions, large and small, for myself. Here I hosted my first seder and began to take ownership over my Jewish life, instead of expecting it to be handed to me.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

Many of my friends have remarked that Halifax is the perfect place to start one's adulthood during the crucial years of university. It has all the big-city amenities: great music, libraries, shops, a reliable transit system, and interesting neighbourhoods.

At the same time, it has retained enough of its maritime friendliness that there's little danger in being lost in a sea of anonymous faces. I can't remember the last time I walked downtown without running into someone I knew. The Jewish community is a beautiful mirror image of this: there are services, vibrant celebrations for all holidays, and interesting cultural events, but at the same time, there's no chance that people won't know who you are if you make the effort to attend just some of these events.

Of course, there is something silly about calling Halifax home. After all, being a student in this city, I always knew that this would be a four-year stint and that I shouldn't get too comfortable. It's certainly strange, and perhaps even futile, to build a community that you know is temporary. Indeed, it seems that the student community itself is structured by the comings and goings that each student partakes in many times a year. The locals are already quite accustomed to the fact that students take off every time there is a break from classes and are rarely seen again once their final exam has been written. There are students who fall so much in love with the city that they find work here, but their numbers are still quite low. Even though most of my friends are quite sad to leave Halifax, there is a general consensus that there are new places to conquer and that Halifax must be consigned to the realm of glorious undergraduate memory.

At the same time, most of us realize the necessity of keeping in touch with our former home. Fours years later, it seems most of us have learned that we don't need to disavow our family homes in order to be an adult. Contrary to the musings of my second-year self, I am well aware that I am not homeless. There may not be one place in the world where I feel entirely at home, but I know I should be thankful for all the places that I do feel comfortable. Perhaps all of these places cobbled together are my home.

Being a student in a self-consciously temporary community was a good reminder that in fact, in life, transitions never truly end. Perhaps an essential part of growing up comes when you realize that not even the most experienced adult has everything figured out.

But I'm certain I'll carry some experiences – such as hosting my own seder – with me, and hopefully this growing ownership over myself and my decisions is something that will remain throughout all of life's transitions.

The Kirshner File

Jewish Film Festival docs examine Holocaust

World War II, with the Holocaust at its core, was one of the major themes of the annual Toronto Jewish Film Festival, which ended last week after yet another successful run.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

The documentaries I watched examined topics ranging from the Nazi theft of Jewish art to the mistreatment of Jews in Italian-occupied Libya. The calibre of these films is such that they are likely to be aired again by television stations in the future. So stay tuned.

The Rape of Europa is a stunning expose of greed and malevolence. Many Nazi leaders, from Adolf Hitler on down, were avid collectors, and if the pickings were free, they were all the more enthusiastic. They looted everything they could get their paws on, including classical paintings, rare religious objects and fine furniture, and more often than not its owners were Jewish. Some of these items have disappeared and may never turn up. Still others, having been bought unwittingly by museums and claimed by the heirs of the original proprietors, are enmeshed in painful litigation.

Hitler, a failed art student whose landscapes and renderings of buildings do not rise above the mediocre, was an obsessive collector, as was his deputy, Hermann Göring. Hitler was partial to Old Masters and German Romantic pieces and despised modern works, or "degenerate art." Göring was not as finicky.

As this meticulously researched film notes, the plundering was launched with Germany's annexation of Austria in 1938 and the establishment of a special department to funnel purloined art to a gargantuan museum Hitler intended to build in his native Austria.

From Poland alone, the Nazis plundered 59,000 items. The Louvre, in Paris, anticipated the looting and shipped its valuables to castles and private homes for safekeeping. Nevertheless, the Nazis seized 16,000 paintings from Jews in France.

The Rape of Europa also documents the extraordinary care the Allies took not to bomb Nazi-held national monuments, the special units they created to track down looted art and the "trophy brigades" the Red Army dispatched into eastern Germany.

Germany and the Soviet Union carved up Poland in 1939, leaving it supine. The German invasion prompted thousands of Polish Jews to flee into the Soviet zone. But once there, some of the Jewish refugees actually returned to the other side, not realizing that genocide awaited Polish Jewry. In virtually every instance, they went back to be reunited with family and friends and to reclaim homes and properties.

During the brief Soviet occupation, Joseph Stalin, the Soviet dictator, arbitrarily sent 500,000 Polish citizens, of whom 200,000 were Jews, to labour camps in Siberia and Central Asia. What they did not know, of course, was that Stalin's policy inadvertently saved their lives.

Life in the Soviet Union was certainly hard, but compared to Nazi-occupied Poland, where Jews were murdered en masse, it was a bed of roses. As a result, most Polish Jews who survived found a haven in the Soviet Union.

Riding in the back seat of a jeep negotiating bumpy roads, they return to a camp in Siberia where they fought off bedbugs, struggled with hunger and deadly diseases and coped with frigid weather in winter. As the movie ends, they go back to a town in Uzbekistan where they apparently spent their last months in the Soviet Union. Far from bitter and realizing how fortunate they were to have been sent to the Soviet Union, they recall the Russians as being friendly, helpful and remarkably free of anti-Semitism.

Hanuszka is the autobiographical tale of Hanna Mandelberger, a 12-year-old Jewish girl who scraped through the Holocaust in Poland by finding refuge in a convent and passing herself off as a Catholic.

Although the trajectory of her story is not unknown, it assumes unique proportions by virtue of the fact that she befriended a young priest, Karol Wojtyla, during this dangerous period. Wojtyla, a rising star in the Polish church, was anointed Pope John Paul II in 1978, and in the 1980s, Hanna, an Israeli citizen, met him at the Vatican.

"It never crossed my mind that you were Jewish," he said, touching off a flood of memories about the war, during which Hanna seriously considered conversion to Christianity and worked for the Polish underground as a courier. The film, which unfolds through dramatizations, flashbacks and Hanna's visit to Rome and Poland as an adult, is of interest, but is less than compelling.

Nazi war criminals stand trial in Nuremberg

A Matter of Time deals with a comparatively little-known aspect of the Holocaust: the deportation of Libyan Jews to the Bergen-Belsen concentration camp in Germany.

When the Wehrmacht, commanded by Gen. Erwin Rommel, conquered Libya, an Italian imperial colony, the Jewish population was immediately imperilled.

Jews who had previously welcomed the British army were arrested and detained in a remote camp in the desert 250 kilometres south of Tripoli. Jews who held British citizenship were transported to Bergen-Belsen. In A Matter of Time, the survivors recall their ordeal and agree that they most likely would have been killed had the Germans not been driven out of Libya by Gen. Bernard Montgomery's British army.

John Ford, the great Hollywood director, was commissioned to film the Nuremberg war crimes trial, which began in 1945, lasted for 10 months and convicted nearly all the Nazi defendants.

Ford's heretofore unseen footage lifts this documentary to new heights and explains the importance of the tribunal in terms of criminal jurisprudence.

The wan defendants, guarded by white-helmeted sentries, look broken and spent. Yet they appear unrepentant after being charged with conspiracy, or premeditated murder. Only Wilhelm Keitel, the Wehrmacht chief of staff, seems contrite, admitting that he "erred" in carrying out his duties. The testimony of a French resistance member, who was brought to Auschwitz, is spellbinding.

Once a Nazi is about the power of conscience.

Adlabert Lallier, a Waffen SS guard at Thererienstadt, immigrated to Canada and taught economics at a Montreal university.

Burdened by guilt at having witnessed the shooting of seven Jews, and seeking redemption, he disclosed that he had been a cog in the Nazi machinery of death.

His confession, which led to the imprisonment of a former concentration guard after a trial in Germany, had unforeseen consequences.

Lallier, whose observations are supplemented by comments from his daughter, his former colleague and his Jewish acquaintances, comes across as a sincere, overwrought do-gooder who wants to do the decent thing late in life.

Toronto to celebrate 40th anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification

Jerusalem - Ours to Share comes to Beth Tzedec June11

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

Forty years ago, on June 11, 1967, Dan Meridor fought as an Israeli Defence Force tank commander with the 7th Brigade in the Sinai during the Six Day War. Merdior was there when the city of Jerusalem was liberated and reunified, ending 19 years of separation between predominantly Arab and Jewish sections of the city.

On June 11 this year, Meridor, a former minister in the Israeli government, and the current chairman of The Jerusalem Foundation, will be the keynote speaker at Jerusalem – Ours to Share, a special celebration at Beth Tzedec Congregation celebrating the fortieth anniversary of the city's reunification.

"Although I was in the heart of the fighting, I do remember the Wednesday when they announced on the radio, that Jerusalem had been liberated," Meridor told Jewish Toronto in a telephone interview. "I remember sitting on the tank in the desert, and everyone was in tears. The reunification of Jerusalem was one of the most exciting and moving days of my life. To this day, when ever I cross the Jaffa Gates into the Old City, it is very exciting."

Sponsored by the Canada-Israel Committee and UJA Federation, Jerusalem – Ours to Share –will celebrate the city's unique place in history for all faiths through music and film.

"This event celebrates the magic and majesty that is Jerusalem," said UJA Federation board chair David Engel. "Jerusalem is a city that has been revered for thousands of years, a city that symbolizes the yearning for peace of everyone in the Middle East."

"Jerusalem symbolizes the redemption of Jewish people and Jewish independence," says Meridor. "Also, it is a beautiful city – over 3,000 years old. It is an impressive combination of modern and old, which is rare. It is a city of diverse population where so many cultures merge with different expectations of what Jerusalem should be."

Jerusalem – Ours to Share, a celebration of Jerusalem will take place at Toronto's Beth Tzedec Congregation on June 11. Above, Israeli soldiers dance in celebration at the Kotel in June, 1967.

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG

To celebrate its 25th anniv ersary, Toronto's Pomegranate Guild of Judaic Textiles, is presenting a new exhibit of Judaic needlework at UJA Federation's partner agency, the Koffler Centre of the Arts, until May 20. "Threads of Identity," which is free to the public and is located in the Loggia of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, showcases original Judaica including challah covers, sukkah decorations, mezuzot, and chuppas.

Since its inception in 1982, the Pomegranate Guild "has brought together people who are interested in studying and creating textile art and needlepoint based on Jewish themes," explains its website, www.pomegranateguild.ca <http://www.pomegranateguild.ca/> .

Visitors can see pieces by individual Guild members as well as group projects. A photo collage gives a broad visual overview of the art created by the Pomegranate Guild in its 25-year history. Also on display is a series of shadowboxes in which guild members interpret the show's theme, "Threads of Identity."

In addition to providing the space free of charge, the Koffler Centre of the Arts arranged and paid for the installation of large pieces, including a Kohen HaGadol (High Priest) wall hanging. "There are eight different pieces of special clothing that he wore," says Elaine Genesove, past president of the Pomegranate Guild and co-chair of the exhibit with Melanie Siegel.

Genesove is hoping visitors will walk away from the exhibit with a new appreciation for the Guild's work and the inspiration to create art of their own. "We want people to know about our guild and the wonderful work we do and to see that Judaic needlework is creative and modern. We also want to get people interested in expressing their Jewishness by creating works of art. The works that we do today are going to be the heirlooms of tomorrow."

Taglit - birthright israel hits milestone of 10,000

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Dave Stein, 24, is no ordinary participant on a Taglit - birthright israel trip. As he boarded Air Canada flight 084 to Tel Aviv with Canada Israel Experience last Wednesday, Stein became the 10,000th Torontonian that Taglit-birthright israel has sent to the Jewish homeland.

The number of Toronto participants on Taglit - birthright israel is second only to New York City. In total, Taglit - birthright israel has sent approximately 120,000 youngsters to the Jewish homeland, with Toronto accounting for over eight percent of that total.

For Stein, Israel provides a connection to his grandparents, who passed away in 2000 and 2001. "When I was five years old, my bubby and zayde went on a trip to Israel and I remember, very vividly, they came back with all their pictures – my Bubby in the sea and them by The Wall – and tales of Israel's history, and since then, I've wanted to go," he says. "It was such a part of my relationship with them."

FREE Trip to Israel

That desire to visit Israel grew when his sister returned from her own trip a few years ago. "She came back with stories and pictures and amazing friends that she's stayed in contact with," he says. "She got me a hand-stitched kippah and a gorgeous Chai necklace, and I was really excited about them, but I also thought, 'I want to experience picking them out myself in Israel.'"

But while anticipating the many personal experiences he hopes to have on the trip, Stein also reflects on the collective significance of 10,000 Toronto young adult Jews visiting Israel. "There's a communal impact because it touches so many individuals," he says. "It changes the Toronto community because there are now 10,000 people here who have more in touch with their Jewish faith and background. The Jewish organizations have more of a force behind them because there are all these people who now have an even greater passion for Jewish causes."

Stein's affiliation with the Jewish community is mainly through his work as a DJ for Mint Lifestyle Events, staffing bar and bat mitzvahs and events such as UJA Federation's Walk With Israel. He is looking forward to meeting other young Jews on his trip.

"There's always a connection between Jews and it'll be great to be able to share such a heart-touching experience," he says. "I'm really excited to meet people from all over Canada and then, as well, especially Israel. My sister made friends there, so hopefully one day we'll go together and I'll have friends and she'll have friends. That'll be cool, to go back."

"We are absolutely delighted to welcome Dave Stein," says Elizabeth Sokolsky, VP Education & Operations, Taglit-birthright Israel. "Taglit - birthright Israel, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and the Canadian Jewish community have been wonderful partners in the birthright program. The positive outcomes for the Toronto Jewish community of having so many young Jewish adults – like Dave - more connected to their Jewish identity and to the land and people of Israel will resonate for years to come."

Walk With Israel will fund important projects

Rain or Shine, annual event takes place on May 27

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

This year's Walk With Israel will be more than an expression of moral support for the people and State of Israel; it will also provide material support for development programs in the country's northern region and elsewhere. Proceeds from this year's Walk, scheduled for May 27, will go to a new daycare centre in Hatzor Haglilit, and educational initiatives for Ethiopian women in Kiryat Moshe. Both projects are being coordinated through the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner.

The daycare centre – with classrooms/activity rooms, kitchenettes, and restrooms, as well as outdoor playgrounds and seating areas – is part of a comprehensive plan to empower the community of Hatzor Haglilit. More than 8,000 of its citizens lived in bomb shelters or were forced to run from their homes under a barrage of Katyusha rockets last summer. While the war with Hezbollah may have receded somewhat from Diaspora thoughts, the people of Hatzor Haglilit are still recovering lost ground.

Today, as the community rebuilds, one area of focus is its underserved 1,400 children up to age six, who at present "lack a formal educational framework that provides enriching daycare," explains the JAFI project proposal. "Active educational and enrichment frameworks for early childhood education form the basis for strengthening not only Israel's North but also our next generation," it continues. "Early childhood is when opportunities begin, and we must ensure that each and every child experiences the type of early environment that will enable him or her to flourish."

And as Walk With Israel funds build a daycare centre in one community, they will train daycare workers in another. The impoverished Rehovot neighbourhood of Kiryat Moshe is populated largely by Ethiopian Jews, a community in which many women lack the education to secure anything but minimum wage jobs.

To help these women climb out of poverty, UJA Federation is joining with JAFI to provide them with vocational training as daycare workers and allied health professionals. The programs, ranging in length from eight months to three years, also include Hebrew language tutorials and workshops on interview skills and resume preparation.

Wunesh Vuvey, who is studying to be a dental assistant, says that "getting a degree will fulfill my dream to help people and have a respectable profession for others in my community to look up to and be proud of. This profession will also help integrate me further into Israeli society, as everyone needs to go to the dentist."

Jewish Foundation opens its heart to Toronto Societies

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

The Toronto Jewish community's future rests in the hands of those with the strongest connection to the past, members of UJA Federation's Societies Division heard at a recent luncheon at the Lipa Green Building for Jewish community Services.

Paula Krakowsky (from Chenstochover Aid Society) presents a cheque to Ronit Holtzman, establishing the Chenstochover Aid Society Endowment Fund at the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

Hosted by the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, the endowment arm of UJA Federation, the event formally introduced the Societies to the Foundation's work and opportunities to get involved.

"There's a way to guarantee that your values live on far into the future," Ronit Holtzman, director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, told those assembled. "To a large degree, many of you are already showing that the Jewish value of tzedakah and communal responsibility is important to you by participating in our annual UJA Federation Campaign and by supporting special projects in Israel. By creating an endowment fund, you can take the necessary steps today to make sure you and your Society will be helping others for many years to come."

Susan Jackson, director of the Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage, emphasized the critical role grandparents play as the "Jewish anchor" in their grandchildren's lives. "When you were growing up, the role model was the rabbi, people who were learned, people who had a set of values," she said. "That, in many ways, is what the grandparents represent today. It's our job to build the community for them, then they take it and hopefully they run with it."

Societies date back to the early 1900s, when Jewish immigrants organized themselves into associations of people from the same villages in Eastern Europe, known in Yiddish as landsmannschaften, which functioned as support systems for the newly-arrived.

The networks were eventually incorporated into the community's federated structure, and under the leadership of co-chairs Michael Rosenberg and Morris Flicht, the 27 active Societies have taken on numerous fundraising projects for Israel. Six Societies have already established funds with the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto.

"The Societies helped promote Jewish education and influenced the next generation to become involved as active community members," said Rosenberg. "It is clear that the effort and hard work has paid off as many of our new community leaders today are children of Societies members."

Scholarships create opportunities for Israel's immigrant students

There are some things that, simply put, make Jews around the world proud to call Israel their homeland.

Israel's investment in the education and advancement of new immigrant young people is one of them. Each year, UJA Federation's overseas partner The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) enriches the future of Jewish people buy supporting Student Authority Scholarships that provide full college tuition for thousands of new immigrants.

Argintinean-born Daniel Saadia Maoz, 29 (pictured above) is a bright young man who exudes the truly rare combination of optimism and realism. In 2002, he fulfilled a lifelong dream and make aliyah. Daniel was determined to go to college, but he was not sure how he would manage to work and pay college tuition. "Without the help of JAFI, it would have been virtually impossible for me to get a college education in Israel." With the financial burden of college tuition lifted by the Student Authority Scholarship, Daniel was able to focus on his studies and earned his BA in international relations and the history of the Jewish people from the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Today, Daniel is close to completing his MA in Middle Eastern studies and international relations and is now involved in Israel advocacy. Daniel also teaches, writes and lectures in a variety of settings.

Children's Israeli dance festival turns 37

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

York University played host to the 37th annual Rikudiyah, the Israeli dance festival for children, on May 6.

The event, co-sponsored by the Koffler Centre for the Arts and UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE), saw grandparents, parents, siblings and friends clapping and singing along excitedly as they watched kids from 14 Ontario Jewish day schools strut their choreographed stuff to traditional music in the university's Tait McKenzie gymnasium.

Seymour Epstein, senior vice-president of Jewish education and identity for the BJE, said the event was the continuation of a great tradition.

"It's a great activity, bringing together all the schools in the spirit of dance," he told The CJN. "It brings us closer to Israel, to music… and to physical education, which is very important."

Organizers estimated that close to 1,000 people attended.

After O Canada and Hatikvah were sung, Rikudiyah got off to a colourful start with the Chai Dancers, a seniors group that performed a dance called the "Magen David Mexicana," using vibrant shawls and Spanish music in a visual celebration of togetherness.

Then came the main event, as all 14 schools took to the floor to hoof it with verve.

This year's theme, "Beyachad" (Together), had the children performing various routines together, in addition to each school presenting its individually prepared dances.

One by one, Kernerman introduced the schools by name and the music they were swaying to.

The schools all danced to six main songs: Orchim L'Kayitz, B'Ahavah Uvmilah Tovah, Veshuv Itchem, Anashim Tovim, Rak Beyachad Ninatzeach and finally the Yiddish melody Alle Brider.

The Nirkoda Israeli dancers then took the floor for a spirited performance of Latzafon B'Ahava, before making way for a collective dance finale to the tune of Hinei Ma Tov.

Kernerman, who founded Rikudiyah and anticipates returning as festival director for her 38th year next spring, stressed the ongoing importance of Rikudiyah.

"I believe [keeping Israeli dance alive] has to start with the kids," she told the CJN. "If they have a good experience when they're young, it will keep Israeli folk dance healthy. Rikudiyah is my way of keeping Israeli folk dance alive for me, for this city and for Israel."

An 'upsherin' and a mitzvah

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Noah Gropper is feeling a bit lightheaded.

Last week, eight inches of his curly blond hair was cut, to be donated to Eva & Co. Wigs, a Vancouver shop that specializes in wigs for cancer patients.

"I'd rather have it long," he said right after the cut at Bialik Hebrew Day School, where he is in Grade 6.

"I'm sure it was hard, but I think he set an example for the other kids," said his mother, Elise Stern.

The family called the event Noah's upsherin to parallel the first haircut ceremony some boys undergo at the age of three. They wanted to hold it as close to Lag b'Omer as possible, when many upsherin ceremonies take place as the restrictions on haircutting are lifted.

Noah Gropper, before his haircut

The family decided to have Noah's hair cut at school, Stern said, because Bialik reinforces the idea of tikkun olam in the students.

Noah's grandfather died of cancer two years ago, and the cut happened a day after the yahrzeit.

"He was close to his zaide and he was very, very loving," said Noah's grandmother, Bernice Stern. "Every Friday he would sit with him and hold his hand."

Dani Tayfour of Dani's Hair Salon, who did the job, said he has done "hundreds" of cuts for cancer.

Tayfour first straightened Noah's hair and separated it into small ponytails. Family members got to snip individual sections, and afterward Tayfour evened out the job.

"I think it's a wonderful opportunity for us to put tikkun olam in practice," said senior division vice-principal Beverley Young, who cut off the last ponytail.

"Tikkun olam is one of the tenets of our philosophy. It's one of the things we really believe in and we take action upon, and this is a really good example," Young said.

The last time Noah had his hair trimmed was last September.

"I took him to get half an inch cut off and he cried," joked his father, Bernie.

Elise Stern said Noah's old hair defined him, but thinks his new style is "gorgeous."

"It hasn't been this short since probably Grade 2," she said. "I'm proud of him."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Stress on education has undeniable effects

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

One particular tribe, one of many such nomadic tribes in the times of Moses, rose above the rest. It quickly distinguished and defined itself in its civility, egalitarianism, decency and hygiene. Most notably, this tribe stood alone by virtue of the fact that in its time, only its members were literate. But it was not only literacy that made it unique. The pursuit of knowledge was also integral to its society.

This people had a law, a law under which they wished to be governed. In order to keep this law, they first had to understand it. In order to live it, they had to learn it. Even a simple understanding of the Torah requires advanced literacy and mental skills.

But simple understanding of the tradition would not do. This law asked all of its adherents to propagate it. The responsibility of its transmission from one generation to the next rested on parents. It was the parents' task to teach the law to their children – youths who question and challenge, young minds that could only be satisfied by logic and intellect. Failure on the part of any parent would be self-evident and a source of great embarrassment. Hence, communal pressure in this endeavour was very real.

This system of transmission from parent to child, in which each member of a generation was expected to educate the next generation, continued until the destruction of the Second Temple. At that point, we are told in the Talmud, an individual named Rabbi Yehoshua ben Gamla instituted a formal system of universal education, one that provided schooling for every child. Wherever the smallest Jewish community existed, one would find educators.

It might be said that all of this stress on education has resulted in advanced levels of intellectual capacity. Torah commentaries and commentaries on talmudic law take one to dizzying heights of intellect that challenge and strain the minds of even the most gifted.

To be sure, this idea of a superior Jewish intellect is a highly sensitive one, since it's rather politically incorrect and loaded with possible anti-Semitic implications.

One might challenge this theory by saying that just because a father is a doctor does not mean that his son will be more inclined toward medicine than anyone else. Yet this is not so, as it has been shown that the sons of doctors disproportionately tend to be doctors themselves. Living in a certain culture and environment has undeniable effects.

In the first half of the 20th century, 14 per cent of the Nobel Prizes in medicine, physics, chemistry and literature were awarded to Jews, despite widespread discrimination and anti-Semitism. In the second half of the 20th century, the percentage rose to 29. And so far in the 21st century, Nobel prizes awarded to Jews stand at 32 per cent of the total. And Jews constitute less than half of one per cent of the world's population.

The gift of the Torah was a precious gift in many ways.

Synagogues must experiment

By EDGAR M. BRONFMAN

Guest Voice

Rabbi Hayyim Hirschensohn, who lived in New Jersey at the turn of the 20th century, espoused a doctrine that Jews, if their intent was clear and honourable, could experiment with their religious observances.

"For the truth," he wrote in 1921, "emerges only after inquiry and investigation, and in the initial stages of study, everyone possesses false beliefs and errs until acquiring a clear comprehension of the matter.".

Rabbi Hirschenson was responding to those who promoted a dogmatic and fixed interpretation of Judaism and Jewish life.

Most pulpit rabbis of large congregations would probably have a difficult time acting on such a statement, and understandably so. The idea of experimentation and trial by error can seem oxymoronic when placed next to the words "religion" and "synagogue."

Yet without experimentation, the synagogue will continue to diminish as Judaism's central institution.

With the approach of Shavuot on May 23, which celebrates the Jews' receiving of the Torah at Mount Sinai and focuses on Jewish learning, let me suggest a few experimental approaches that might result in increased synagogue attendance and engagement.

In the world of Orthodoxy, why wouldn't a rabbi experiment with some forms of gender equality? Even within the limitations of Orthodox Jewish law, why wouldn't a rabbi try to propose that instead of a minyan of 10 men, there should be one of 10 men and 10 women?

Why wouldn't a rabbi in a Reform congregation experiment with dispensing with the Torah reading as it is done now, ask the congregants to read the parshah before the service begins, and then have a discussion involving any congregant who wants to be involved? Perhaps that same rabbi would refrain from giving a sermon to allow time to thoroughly discuss the Torah reading.

Most importantly, all synagogues would do well to experiment with shortening the length of service. Two to three hours is a daunting commitment for anyone, let alone someone who wants to explore Judaism for the first time.

When I speak with young people, they tell me that services should be shortened. But even then, an hour can be too much, if what transpires is boring, irrelevant and bereft of meaning. With beautiful music, choirs chanting, meaningful short services and prayers that speak to the human condition, perhaps we can attract a younger segment of the population, especially if we ask them to participate.

A 2006 poll conducted by Gallup ranked Jews second to last in terms of weekly worship attendance, beating out only those who report no religious affiliation.

The Evangelical churches burgeoning across the country prove that congregational life can be meaningful and relevant and a source for communal identification. Aside from taking contemporary visual and audio esthetics seriously – something sorely lacking in synagogues – the success of these groups has come from realizing that massive, anonymous Sunday church experiences alone fail to provide worshippers with the kind of rich communal experience they are seeking.

Therefore, alongside the large-scale gatherings we see on TV, Evangelicals empower the laity to take part in smaller study groups hosted in their friends' homes and other intimate venues. Encouraging laity to experiment with where and when services are held does not weaken communal bonds; it diversifies and strengthens the core religious experience.

Some congregations and organizations have begun to promote and adopt such an experimental approach. Others have gone further, permanently changing their services and venues based on the above-mentioned ideas. Such initiatives should be encouraged and the experimental outlook fostered.

Synagogues have long been bastions of the most conservative tendencies – lengthy, drawn-out services, geshrying over our historical grievances and focused more on God's needs than on man's yearnings. Instead, we should encourage synagogues to become places of joy where people find meaning and fulfilment.

Many of us respect and admire the traditional forms of synagogue life as important strands in the rich overall tapestry of Jewish life and observance. We hope and trust that those forms will always be there for those who are drawn to them. But for the most part, synagogues whose raison d'être is to preserve a certain form or style will inevitably lose their ability to respond adequately to the needs and aspirations of younger people.

The challenge before rabbis of all branches of Jewish observance is to make the synagogue experience joyful and affirming on an everyday basis.

Can experiments like broadening minyans and shortening prayer services achieve that goal? If we don't try, how will we ever know?

'Top books' not to every taste

The Top Ten – Writers Pick Their Favorite Books*, edited by J. Peder Zane, W.W. Norton & Company.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Are you looking for a book to read? You shouldn't have any trouble. In 2005, American publishers produced more than 150,000 new titles. That's 50,000 more books than had been accumulated in the nine-century history of the ancient, renowned library in Alexandria, Egypt.

Consider this: since 1980 more than two million books have been created, compared to the 1.3 million titles published in the preceding 100 years. If you peruse one book a week starting at the age of five, and live to be 80, you will have read a grand total of 3,900 books – a little more than one-10th of 1 per cent of the books currently in print.

Social critics continue to bemoan the decline in reading and the death of the age of literacy. Such baleful notions are misplaced. Actually, our age is swimming in books.

J. Peder Zane, a veteran book reviewer and editor, eager to help us find our way through the literary labyrinth, has asked 125 well-known American and British writers this question, "What are the 10 greatest works of fiction of all time?" Their answers provide an informative, often fascinating guide to the world's most extraordinary books.

Altogether, 544 books were selected. The editor has broken down this larger list into smaller, helpful categories such as the top 10 list, the 10 top works of 19th- and 20th- century literature and the 10 top novels by American and British writers. A welcome feature of the book is the well-considered one-paragraph summaries of all of the books mentioned.

The top 10 list is:

- Anna Karenina by Leo Tolstoy
- Madame Bovary by Gustave Flaubert
- War and Peace by Leo Tolstoy
- Lolita by Vladimir Nabokov
- The Adventures of Huckleberry Finn by Mark Twain
- Hamlet by William Shakespeare
- The Great Gatsby by F. Scott Fitzgerald
- In Search of Lost Time by Marcel Proust
- The stories of Anton Chekhov
- Middlemarch by George Eliot

The top 10 works by living writers are:

- One Hundred Years of Solitude by Gabriel Garcia Marquez .
- To Kill a Mockingbird by Harper Lee
- Beloved by Toni Morrison
- The Catcher in the Rye by J.D. Salinger
- Rabbit Angstrom by John Updike
- Slaughterhouse-Five by Kurt Vonnegut
- Blood Meridian by Cormac McCarthy
- The Stand by Stephen King
- The stories of Alice Munro
- The Prime of Miss Jean Brodie by Muriel Spark

Where the group of top 10 selections are concerned, there are few surprises. However, the larger pool of recommendations offers a generous number of lesser known significant books.

Not everyone is happy about lists of recommended books. Joseph Epstein maintains, "How useful it would be to have an authoritative list of books that despite the world's generally high opinion of them, one really need not read: books that are generally overrated or overwritten – books that somehow or other do not come near repaying the time required to read them!"

Samuel Johnson said that a person ought to read just as inclination leads him; for what he reads as a task will do him little good.

In the end, many books – even if they are universally regarded as great and enduring – don't satisfy every taste, sensibility or intellect. For some readers, they don't have the power to inspire or nourish. Book lovers have their own small library of golden volumes that opened their eyes to new visions or unlocked their souls. For them, these books remain supreme.

The Six Day War, Part 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The war may have only lasted six days, but its impact was immediate and its legacy is still felt – and debated – 40 years later.

For many Jews in the Diaspora, the war meant it was time to help Israel. In mid-June, Lydia Aisenberg phoned the Israeli Embassy in London "to ask if I could do something to help – thinking of sticking stamps or answering phones." Rather than licking stamps, Lydia found herself working in the fields of Kibbutz Mishmar HaEmek. [http://tinyurl.com/363tyz]

Ilana Rosen remembers "marching with others down Cheetham Hill Road in Manchester, carrying an Israeli flag, to a rally at the New Century Hall, and everybody along the route [non-Jews and Jews] was cheering us. (A bit different from now!)" [http://tinyurl.com/yv77mo]

There was certainly pride in Israel's military prowess. But in the days and weeks following the war, it was not hard to hear the word "miracle" being used to describe what had happened. The Lubavitcher Rebbe is quoted as saying in August 1967, "This was a war won by Torah and mitzvot. There can be no doubt of this. A Jew in Moscow recited Psalms, and a Jew in Buffalo, N.Y., put on tfillin, and this helped the Jews defeat their enemies in the Land of Israel." [http://tinyurl.com/2zncbq]

And the long-term effects of the war on the world's Jews? In Andrew Furman's review of The Six-Day War and World Jewry, he cites examples to illustrate that the effect on some western Jewish communities was less pronounced than one might have expected. "The rates of aliyah… did not rise dramatically, if at all, in the years after the war. And the public status of the Jews and Jewry in these [western] countries appears to have changed minimally… As Israel's perceived ethos shifted in the years subsequent to the war from that of the heroic underdog to the dominant military force in the Middle East… increasing tensions developed between Israel and the more liberal segments of the Jewish population in the pluralistic-democratic Diaspora." [http://tinyurl.com/3xuf48])

For Jews living in Arab countries, the war had a very different effect. SixDayWar.co.uk looks at the repercussions of the war on the members of Jewish communities throughout the Arab world, most of whom fled to Israel, and to France and North America. [http://tinyurl.com/258pjy]

In June 1967, the UN Security Council passed several resolutions calling for a ceasefire in the area. But it wasn't until November that it passed a resolution still being quoted four decades later. Security Council Resolution 242 called for "withdrawal of Israeli armed forces from territories occupied in the recent conflict" and recognition that "every state in the area" has the "right to live in peace within secure and recognized boundaries free from threats or acts of force." You can read the resolution at the Jewish Virtual Library. [http://tinyurl.com/ywjjwd]

One of the longest entries I've come across about the war can be found in Wikipedia. [http://tinyurl.com/ e2oyy] Not surprisingly, the entry carries this note: "The neutrality of this article is disputed." More interesting than the article itself is the area where the cause and legacy of the war are debated. And since this is Wikipedia, you, too, can join the discussion. [http://tinyurl.com/ytgn3k]

Michael Oren, author of Six Days of War, suggests another lesson can be learned from the war. He says that that war was not inevitable and points to several events – some of which seemed relatively trivial at the time – that collectively brought the region over the brink. The lesson for observers 40 years later?

"Today, like 1967, the Middle East faces a situation in which a large-scale war could be ignited by a relatively small spark. In these circumstances, rational decision-making, cogent analysis and logical reactions to events on the ground are, in the end, often subordinate to the vicissitudes of fortune, the vagaries of war and dumb luck. Chance and randomness had a profound influence on the conduct of the Six Day War and on the war's impact on the region and the world. Recognizing the power of chance – then and now – is both humbling and frightening." [http://tinyurl.com/pnkcl]

Is kosher organic food worth the money?

By ASHLEY SPEGEL

Special to The CJN

The popularity of organic foods is heightening as health-conscious consumers are demanding nutritious alternatives to what's presented at their grocery stores.

Organic meats have a lot in common with kosher goods, including health regulations and standards, and the two are merging together in an attempt to attract a Jewish market.

"We've been carrying kosher organics for a couple of years now but it doesn't seem like there's a big market for it," said the manager of Hartman's Kosher Meat, who asked not to be identified. "Kosher meat is really expensive on account of the dietary laws that have to be followed. By eating kosher you're eating a healthier product, and organic is higher up in terms of quality and price."

Kosher organic meats double, triple and quadruple in price compared to kosher meats, and the manager at Hartman's argues there's no reason to go organic because kosher is a sufficient and affordable alternative.

"The concept of kosher is that the product is checked for diseases and flaws before it's sold. It's cleaner than other meats and you're already going health-conscious by buying kosher, so why go organic?"

An organic product is raised, grown and processed without exposure to synthetically produced chemicals or fertilizers, herbicides, insecticides, fungicides, growth hormones or growth regulators. Meat and produce aren't exposed to harmful chemicals and are believed to be safer, healthier and more nutritious.

Aviva Allen, author of The Organic Kosher Cookbook, has been buying kosher organic foods for four years because of her experience working on an organic farm in Connecticut. She's always kept kosher and said adding organics into her diet was a natural step.

"[Within] Judaism you'll find there's a lot of laws and philosophies that are similar to the regulations of organic farming," she said. "Both share the principle which encourages healthy eating and awareness of what goes into your body."

Aviva Allen

The Jewish laws Oshek and Chovel assert workers have to be compensated fairly for their labour and they shouldn't be injured when doing their job. Similarly, organic work regulations state that all workers must be treated fairly and be compensated accordingly for their labour.

Shmirat haguf, another law Allen follows, emphasises safeguarding the body.

The Environmental Protection Agency considers 60 per cent of all herbicides, 90 per cent of all fungicides and 30 per cent of all insecticides to be carcinogenic. Research suggests that if these chemicals are successful at killing living creatures, they can also be harmful to humans.

"The health of your body is dependent on what you're fuelling it with," she said. "I feel it's worth it to pay slightly more for food that's going to be more nutritious minus hormones, antibiotics, pesticides, and that's where I choose to put my money."

Kosherfest is an annual convention held in New York City where vendors come together to discuss the future of kosher foods. Kosher organics was the buzz of the 2007 convention, and Manny Alter, manager of Toronto Kosher, was convinced the hot topic would generate demand back home.

"The underlying theme of the event was organic, everything from crackers to meats," he said. "However, in New York you can get kosher organic meat easily and in Toronto there's no market for it. It's a challenging market because the kosher meat market is difficult as is."

Alter says the lack of awareness in the Toronto Jewish community is one reason why organic meats haven't gained popularity. Another reason is price.

"We sell kosher chicken wings for approximately $4 but the same product that's organic is $9," said Alter.

Currently, the grocers supplying kosher organic meat and poultry rely on shipments from Montreal because Toronto doesn't have a producer. Since supply and demand is low and shipping costs are high, grocers like Toronto Kosher are no longer carrying kosher organic meats.

"[Buying organic is not] necessarily more expensive, it depends on where you're purchasing it," said Allen, who gets her organics from Ambrosia, Whole Foods Market, and Hartman's. "If you're buying local organic [produce] and you shop at farmer's markets you can get better quality and lower prices because you're taking out the middle man. If you're buying seasonally, it'll also be cheaper."

She says the organic foods at grocery stores are at a higher price because of the intense labour put into harvesting them. Organic farms are small operations where farmers spend the majority of their time in the fields. Rather than a plane flying over a field of crops to spray pesticides and herbicides, the farmer is in the field pulling out the weeds with his hands.

"A lot of people are turned off by the price," said Alter. "I think that if you're not going to lead a fully organic lifestyle it's not worth it."

"I feel a difference by eating organic food," said Allen. "Being able to eat kosher and organic makes me feel good from both angles. It's like a double mitzvah."

Ex-UN ambassador speaks about threats to Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The former U.S. ambassador to the United Nations, John Bolton, an outspoken advocate of the effort to prevent Iran from becoming a nuclear power, was in Toronto last week to speak about the threats facing Israel and western democracies.

Bolton was the keynote speaker at an event titled Jerusalem and the Jewish People, which was organized by Aish HaTorah to celebrate its 25th anniversary, as well as the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

The event, held May 8 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts, was attended by hundreds of members of the Jewish community, who were addressed by a number of guest speakers, including Rabbi Noah Weinberg, the founder of Aish Hatorah and a leader of the kiruv (Jewish outreach) movement; Malcolm Hoenlein, the executive vice-chairman of the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations; and Yitzchok Yifat, who was among the first Israel Defence Forces troops to enter the Old City of Jerusalem during the Six Day War in 1967.

Guests were also treated to a performance by Israeli singing sensation Yoel Sharabi, who sang songs that included Yerushalayim Shel Zahav (Jerusalem of Gold).

After speeches in tribute to Jerusalem, Bolton spoke about the challenges and security threats that face Israel and the West.

He said the four biggest threats to Israel and western democracies are the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, Lebanon and Syria, Iraq and Iran.

Bolton said that there is no doubt that citizens of the Middle East are suffering hardships as a result of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, but he doesn't believe that now is the time to negotiate a peace deal.

"I hear leaders in the United States say that it is time for Israel to work harder on the peace process with the Palestinians. I question that approach. I don't think this is the right time for Israel and certainly not the right time for Palestinians," he said, referring to the fact that Palestinians are on the verge of civil war.

John Bolton

He said the argument that the disputes in the Middle East – including the conflict between people in Lebanon and Syria, the ongoing civil war in Iraq, and the belligerence of Iran – will disappear if Israel comes to an agreement, are wrong.

"They've all got nothing to do with the State of Israel… The solution of the Israeli-Palestinian issues won't do the slightest thing to change that."

Speaking about Israel's conflict with Hezbollah, Bolton said Iran and Syria provide the terror group with millions of dollars a year for weapons and operational costs, and without this kind of outside help, Hezbollah wouldn't be what it is today.

He criticized western democracies that failed to support Israel during the Second Lebanon War.

Bolton said that even though Hezbollah launched unprovoked attacks against Israeli civilians, and in this case, ended up killing several IDF soldiers and kidnapping two others, Israel was widely criticized for using disproportionate force.

Bolton also spoke about the war in Iraq, saying that the highest motives are behind the actions of U.S. forces there.

No American wants to occupy Iraq, he said.

"What happened in Iraq falls into two analytical categories. The first category is whether it was right to overthrow Saddam Hussein because of the threat that he posed to the region, and second is the handling the matters after the fall. There is not the slightest doubt in my mind, with everything we know today, that the overthrow of Saddam Hussein was unquestionably the right thing to do."

But the biggest threat to the stability of the Middle East, and the rest of the world, is Iran, he said.

"[Iran] is a pursuer of weapons of mass destruction, it is an authoritarian government and it supports international terror on a global basis."

He said that the biological, chemical and nuclear weapons that Iran and North Korea are pursuing are only used against innocent civilian populations and this is why it is up to democracies such as the United States to stop these regimes.

"Iran poses a devastating threat to Israel, a small country where two or three nuclear weapons would produce what [U.S.] President [George. W.] Bush calls a 'nuclear Holocaust.'"

He said that all the negotiations with Iran over the past three years have failed because they haven't been able to stop Iran from enriching uranium.

"The longer we persist in the delusion that these negotiations can be successful, the closer the Iranians will be to a point where we simply can't control them anymore. I believe that the only approach that will be successful is to greatly increase economic and political pressure, leading to a necessary overthrow of the government in Tehran."

Kolel conference to study women and Judaism

The first Canadian conference in more than 10 years on the subject of women and Judaism takes place June 3 and 4.

Hosted by Kolel and The Learning Centre, the conference is called L'hadlik Ner: Bringing Women's Light to Jewish Learning.

"I'm so thrilled that such a conference – both academic and spiritual – is taking place in our community," said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, rabbinic director of Kolel. "It's a fabulous array of speakers and experiences focusing on the depth of this topic."

Pluralistic in nature, the conference features speakers from across the entire Jewish denominational spectrum. Women and men interested in issues related to women and Judaism will find a plethora of learning opportunities.

Topics include Jewish law on matters relating to women; female characters and narratives and laws about women in the Bible; theological issues such as God language and how gender affects spirituality; cultural issues such as women expressing themselves and their Jewish identities through poetry, art and film; ritual issues such as women in synagogue and women's life-cycle events; and sociological issues such as women in leadership roles in the Jewish community, the "image" of the Jewish woman, stereotypes, etc.

"The many voices of our Jewish expressions have always served to enrich Jewish dialogue," explains Rachael Turkienicz, founder and director of the Learning Centre. "It's fantastic to bring these varied expressions to focus on women and their Jewish spirituality. What a celebration!"

Speakers from Canada and the United States include rabbis, academics and Toronto comedians Tracey Erin Smith and Diane Flacks – all are supportive of the conference's goals of open dialogue and study.

Kolel and the Learning Centre – which are both pluralistic centres dedicated to intra-Jewish dialogue through study and discussion – have been partners before. L'hadlik Ner: Bringing Women's Light to Jewish Learning is the third of a three-part co-sponsored series that began with the very successful workshops Bringing Women's Light to Chanukah and Bringing Women's Light to Passover.

June 3 highlights include an opening keynote address by Blu Greenberg, the first president of the Jewish Orthodox Feminist Alliance. The evening continues with a roundtable "dialogue dinner" followed by a women's music and cabaret featuring Czech born singer-songwriter of world and new Jewish music Lenka Lichtenberg; Tracey Erin Smith of the one-woman show The Burning Bush! and Diane Flacks of the three solo shows Myth Me, By A Thread and Random Acts.

June 4 highlights a morning keynote speech by Avielah Barclay, the first woman to be certified as a Torah scribe. Prof. Norma Joseph, director of the women and religion specialization in the department of religion at Concordia University, is the afternoon's keynote speaker.

During the day, there will be more than 20 workshops on a wide range of topics. The conference concludes with a study session co-taught by Rabbi Goldstein and Turkienicz.

Space is limited. The conference takes place at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, 4588 Bathurst St. For registration, schedule and prices go to www.kolel.org or call 416-636-1880, ex. 385; 416-630-6488, or 416-633-5100.

Israeli centre helps heal victims of psychotrauma

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The director of the Temmy and Albert Latner Israel Center for the Treatment of Psychotrauma (ICTP) says that seeing someone "come out of it" is a beautiful process.

Brom was in Toronto recently to raise awareness of ICTP, established in 1989 as a project of the Herzog Hospital Latner Institute. The centre meets the diverse needs of trauma victims by treating post-traumatic symptoms and reinforcing natural coping mechanisms.

Danny Brom

He also announced that Canadian Friends of Herzog Hospital is presenting a fundraising concert in honour of Albert Latner, planned for Oct. 25 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts.

Brom, a clinical psychologist who grew up in Holland, was the first director of the Dutch Institute for Psychotrauma. He said that one of the greatest challenges for therapists at his centre is realizing that they are as vulnerable as the patients they are treating.

"It is an unwritten rule that when therapists' children go into the army, they do not lead a group of bereaved parents.

"People cope by thinking that 'it won't happen to me.' This illusion is broken when they are confronted with their fears."

A new ICTP program, he said, is aimed at soldiers just coming off duty. "These soldiers may not be suffering from post-traumatic stress disorder, but they do need to recover."

The centre is now organizing boating trips for these soldiers because the staff has learned that it is healing to be part of a group in an outdoor challenge, he said.

"They are coming out of a situation in which they had no control, and these trips give them back a feeling of control over their environment."

He discovered the concept from a group that arranged similar trips for cancer survivors, Brom said, "and we thought that we could adapt it for our soldiers. It could work, as well, for Canadian and American soldiers."

Another ICTP program is aimed at families living near Sderot, where Qassam rockets have been falling for about six years.

"We want to safeguard the children's development and try to prevent any long-term difficulties."

In the '90s, Brom said, research was done on children of Holocaust survivors, and it was discovered that about 15 to 20 per cent have long-term difficulties in maintaining relationships and regulating emotions.

"We started looking at children living in Sderot and were amazed to discover that 30 per cent of the children in the 300 families we looked at had developmental and behavioural problems."

Looking further, he said, they learned that two-thirds of this 30 per cent had parents with post-traumatic stress disorder.

Watching the parents and children playing together, he said, they noticed that anxious parents either do not let their children out of their sight, or on the other hand, withdraw from them.

"Our goal is to have them interact in a healthy way. We want to reach the children now, so they don't wake up in 30 years with unresolved problems. By teaching parents to deal with their fears, we are investing in the future of the kids."

The centre also trains day-care staff and teachers to identify children who may be experiencing problems, and helps the staff understand that the anxiety they feel in their daily lives can reflect on the kids in a negative way, Brom said.

"We work with staff on containing their own anxiety, and give them tools to work with the children."

He said his staff is busiest when things in Israel are calmer. "During peak periods, people do not want to hear about our services. They just need to get through the difficult time.

"When things calm down, that is when they begin to think about what happened. That is typically the process."

With the knowledge they have gathered at their centre, he said, ICTP staff has gone to Mississippi to help the victims of Hurricane Katrina, and to New York after 9/11. "We are planning on creating an international collaboration so that we can share our knowledge with other communities.

"Terror and violence are here to stay, and we need to reach out and help people. We cannot say, 'Things will be okay.' That is the passive approach. We have to be active in our outreach."

The biggest problem the centre faces, he said, "is that there is so much to be done, we don't know where to direct our money. Small children and their parents are a burning issue, but we also have to help soldiers recover. It is almost impossible to choose which programs to fund first."

For information on the fundraising concert, e-mail herzoghospital@rogers.com, or call 416-256-4222.

A legal threat may do the trick

Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Question: My husband is divorced since 1991 and has children ages 22, 21, 20 and 18, now all working full time.

None of them are in school anymore, but he owes tens of thousand of dollars in "arrears" for the time the children were already working full time.

His ex-wife will not send a letter to the Government child support enforcement office, the FRO, admitting any of this, so they are not erasing the arrears. What are we to do?

Answer: Make an application to the court to retroactively cancel the arrears on the grounds of a material change in circumstances: namely, that the children are no longer in school and are working full time.

Once you even serve the court documents on his wife, she is liable to write the FRO because she may not wish to incur the unnecessary court costs of needlessly defending the lawsuit, especially if she loses.

Why? If she loses she will have to pay your husband's legal costs. In fact, an initial letter from a competent family law lawyer with the threat of such a lawsuit may do the trick.

Question: My friend, who recently got her Canadian citizenship, is about to give birth out of wedlock. She wants to remain single and wants her baby to exclusively use her maiden family name, especially on the birth certificate.

What are the pros and cons of my friend's decision regarding the baby's last name in the long term from the child's point of view?

Answer: Legally speaking, the mother just may find it more difficult later to make a child support or paternity application to be credible.

For the child, there are no technical legal ramifications within Canadian law, other than that he too could be denying himself the right to child support from his Dad later in life, if he so chooses.

Knowing his genetic history may also become crucial for health reasons at some stage. Also, if his Dad is a citizen of another country, such as the U.S.A., there are significant benefits in having him on your birth certificate because the child automatically can benefit from his Dad's foreign citizenship rights, if he wishes it.

On the flip side, if Dad later wants to have access to the child it will obviously be easier to prove he's the Dad if his name is on the certificate. But then again, Dad can always legally insist upon DNA tests if he is serious about making a court application for those rights.

Finally, the child much later in life may actually resent not knowing.

'Miss Moneypenny' tormented the Nazis

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Vera Atkins was an unknown and unsung hero of World War II, at least until quite recently.

A brilliant woman with a misleadingly innocent smile and an eagle eye for detail, she was a spymaster, responsible for recruiting and training a select group of British spies whose mission was to torment the Nazi occupiers of France.

Always remaining in the shadows, she worked for the Special Operations Executive, formed by Prime Minister Winston Churchill after the fall of France in 1940 "to set Europe ablaze."

Atkins was a Romanian Jew whose real name was Vera Maria Rosenberg. By all accounts, she apparently inspired Ian Fleming to create the character Miss Moneypenny in his James Bond series.

She died on June 24, 2000.

Atkins, who did not write her memoirs, never received public recognition until France honoured her in 1995 at a special ceremony during which she received the Légion d'Honneur. Recently she was singled out as an extraordinary person by William Stevenson, the author of Spymistress: The Life of Vera Atkins (Arcade).

Vera Atkins was an unsung hero of World War II

Stevenson, a British-born Canadian journalist who has written books ranging from A Man Called Intrepid to 90 Minutes at Entebbe, discussed Atkins at a book launch last month at the Friends of Simon Wiesenthal Center for Holocaust Studies in Toronto. By chance, he spoke on the 64th anniversary of the Warsaw Ghetto uprising.

Stevenson, who met Atkins when he was a boy scout in London, described her as "this very English girl," who was both ruthless and outspoken.

Born in Bucharest, she settled in London with her parents in 1933. Adopting her mother's maiden name, Etkin, she studied modern languages at the University of Paris and and went to a finishing school in Switzerland.

Stevenson, a Canadian businessman who would later head up British intelligence, met Atkins before the war and sent her on a fact-finding trip to Europe to gather material about the growing Nazi threat.

In her first mission, Stevenson related, she brought back an Enigma decoding machine from Poland. During the war, the device helped the Allies immeasurably.

Although she was technically an enemy alien, her boss at the Special Operations Executive, Maurice Buckmaster, seems to have had no qualms about hiring Atkins as his assistant.

The group's mandate was to harass German personnel in France linked to the occupation.

Atkins recruited 480 agents from a cross-section of society, and they were trained to pass as French citizens.

According to Stevenson, they wreaked havoc on the Nazis.

With the help of the French resistance movement, they cut phone lines, blew up bridges and tunnels and derailed military trains.

During the 1944 Allied invasion of Normandy, they harassed German divisions rushed to France, slowing them down and turning the tide of the war.

U.S. Gen. Dwight D. Eisenhower, the supreme commander of Allied forces, had high praise for Atkins' agents, saying they were "the equivalent of 15 divisions."

Fiercely loyal to her agents, Atkins stood on the runway to watch each batch take off to parachute into France.

One hundred eighteen were captured, tortured and murdered by the Germans. She herself did not venture into enemy territory because "she knew too much," Stevenson noted.

After the war, Atkins spent almost a year tracking the deaths of her agents, interrogating Nazi concentration camp officers who may have come into contact with them.

Atkins also interviewed the commandant of Auschwitz, Rudolf Hoss, who told her that 1.5 million Jews had been exterminated there.

Despite her stellar performance, Atkins fought running turf battles with British officials who disapproved of the methods used by the Special Operations Executive and, in a class-ridden nation, opposed the recruitment of agents from "the street," Stevenson said.

He added that because of anti-Semitism, she concealed her background as a Jew.

Impressed by the Special Operations Executive, he convinced Roosevelt to create the OSS – the Office of Strategic Services – the forerunner of the Central Intelligence Agency.

Atkins, who was single, retired after the war, living in a cottage from which, on a clear day, she could make out the coastline of France.

"She lived quietly – and silently – for the next half-century," Stevenson writes of Miss Moneypenny, otherwise known as Vera Atkins.

Aboriginal leader sees Israel as model for his people

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Ovide Mercredi, a former grand chief of the Assembly of First Nations, says he has returned from his first visit to Israel determined to use the Jewish state's accomplishments as a model for his own people.

"I didn't know what to expect before I went," said Mercredi, who is currently chief of the Misipawistik (Grand Rapids) Cree Nation in northern Manitoba. "The media only focuses on the conflict."

But Mercredi came away impressed by the Jewish state.

"It was amazing what Israel has accomplished in such a short time," he said. "I kept reflecting on how we could use Israel's model for the benefit of my own First Nations people.

"I saw a country with scarce land and water resources, but a lot of intelligence. First Nations people also have few natural resources. There is no reason that we can't use our intelligence to overcome our lack of resources and develop our communities' economies."

Mercredi said he also learned from his visit that you can't rely on others. You have to do things for yourself.

Mercredi's trip came as a result of a Manitoba-JNF memorandum of understanding that was signed last June. It called for the province to commit $1 million to be invested with the Jewish Foundation of Manitoba to support scientific and technological exchanges between Manitoba and Israel.

One of the priorities of the agreement was the adaptation of Israeli greenhouse technology to a northern Manitoba community.

After they spent a week visiting First Nations communities last July, JNF scientist Avi Gafni and Graham Dixon, president of JNF for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, concluded that the Misipawistik Cree Nation, led by Mercredi, was the best community for a pilot project.

The community, located about 450 miles north of Winnipeg, has a year-round population of close to 800, with another 800 people living in the area.

Mercredi's visit to Israel was co-ordinated by JNF. Also part of the April 23-May 3 trip were five other members of the Misipawistik Cree Nation, as well as Dixon and his wife, Faye, Ray Hoemsen from Red River College and Manitoba Agriculture's Brian Hunt.

They visited Moshav Hayogev's greenhouses in the north, where the moshav grows herbs, vegetables and flowers. They also stopped at the Technion - Israel Institute of Technology to meet with a professor of agricultural engineering, and later visited the greenhouse at Bakaa Al Gharbia and the Yair Station greenhouses/hothouses and fish farms in the Arava, a low rainfall region, as well as other areas of agricultural interest.

Mercredi said he was struck by the range of activity fostered by JNF, which he sees as a model for "how people can liberate themselves from dependency."

He added that he'd like to establish a version of JNF for Canada's First Nations people.

"I am really excited about this project," he said of JNF's involvement in developing a greenhouse in his community. He also foresees selling surplus produce to other northern Manitoba communities that are equally starved for fresh vegetables, and having his community's greenhouse serve as a model for other northern communities that also decide to build greenhouses.

Mercredi said he has a meeting scheduled for early June with the provincial government, Red River College and Manitoba Hydro, all partners in the project.

Well-known lawyer named to the bench

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA – Prominent Ottawa lawyer Stanley Kershman was sworn in as a judge of the Superior Court of Justice of Ontario on March 27.

Kershman, well known as an expert in bankruptcy and insolvency, practised with the firm of Perley-Robertson, Hill and McDougall and sat as a small claims court judge. He is also the author of Put your Debt on a Diet, about which he has been interviewed widely in the media, both in Canada and the United States.

> Family court has been a learning experience

Born and educated in Ottawa, Kershman graduated from the University of Ottawa Law School in 1976 and has practised in this city ever since.

The son of Sylvia and the late Harry Kershman, and the father of teenaged children Kayla and Zev, the newly minted judge credits the support of his family for his accomplishments in life.

"I have received a huge amount of support from my family – my wife Carol, my mother, my late father and my extended family and friends. That support has allowed me to achieve my goals. Without support, it is much more difficult," he said.

Being extremely focused and goal oriented is a trait that has served Kershman well throughout his career.

"I set goals in my life and one of those was to become a judge," he said. "About 15 years ago, I thought this would be the next stepping stone. From that point, my focus was on doing what was necessary, which meant going to court, which meant writing, which meant being knowledgeable of litigation, as opposed to strictly solicitor's work."

Kershman will be based in Ottawa but will also be sitting throughout eastern Ontario.

He said his first assignment, in family court, has been a learning experience.

"It really has opened my eyes to the fact that I have been very lucky in terms of the type of life I have led," he said. "A lot of what I have seen in the family law area really makes me grateful for the wonderful life I have."

A long-time member and regular attendee of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, Kershman is proud of his Jewish identity and finds comfort in his faith.

"Every Saturday morning I go [to shul] because for me it is a most enjoyable part of the week… it provides me with an opportunity to thank God for everything, and it allows me to see a whole different family, my shul friends and family, which is in itself an amazing support group."

גליה סרנר, ממארגנות האירוע מסכמת:

Man arrested for punching chassidic teen

By JANICE ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — Jewish groups say the attack on a chassidic teenager by a 24-year-old man appears to be a hate crime, but Montreal police say there is no evidence of that and he will likely be charged with simple assault.

"Considering the victim's dress, it is reasonable to fear that the crime was motivated by hate," Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region president Jeffrey Boro, a criminal lawyer, said in a statement.

B'nai Brith Canada feels the same. Allan Adel, national chair of its League for Human Rights and also a lawyer, said the attack has "the hallmarks of a hate crime."

The man, whose name was not released pending his appearance in municipal court scheduled for July 9, was captured on a chassidic school's surveillance video camera. He crossed Bloomfield Avenue in Outremont, apparently without provocation, and punched the boy in the head, hard enough to knock him to the ground.

The boy was bruised but not seriously hurt and returned to school the next day.

Witnesses called 911 and police arrested the man a few blocks away. He was later released.

The attack took place on May 10, around 5:40 p.m. in broad daylight, near the Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef yeshiva, which the boy was leaving. This is the same school that suffered significant damage after a Molotov cocktail was thrown into its entrance in September. Two suspects in that incident were arrested last month and are being detained. Police do not believe there is any connection to this latest incident.

Police spokesperson Claude Hamel said the attack appears to be one of mistaken identity. The suspect told police that a female friend of his had been hurt by a Jewish man a couple of weeks earlier, and he thought it was the boy. According to police, he said he did not realize his victim was so young and apologized.

Boro suggested that the attack may have something to do with the "reasonable accommodation" of minorities debate that has been raging in Quebec for many months.

Both Jewish groups applauded the police for their quick response. However, Adel reiterated B'nai Brith's call for a specialized hate-crimes unit like those in Toronto and Vancouver, an idea police chief Yvan Delorme has rejected.

Dlin had been chair of a parent committee called "Preserve our Presence," which lobbied to have the Richmond Hill branch remain open.

However, many of the Dlin family's friends also stayed with the school, "based on the promise of the Lebovic campus opening in 2008, as well as a promise made that when the campus opened, it would open with all grades," he wrote.

Like a number of other families, the Dlins moved to Thornhill Woods more than two years ago to be close to the Lebovic campus. Their new house cost "a great deal more" than their previous home in Aurora.

He also resigned as a York region teacher to take a position at the the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto's Richmond Hill location, which will move to the Lebovic campus this September.

"In a sense, my family has placed many of our eggs in the Lebovic basket," he wrote.

Having decided to stay, he said, he wanted to be more actively involved in USDS' policy and decision-making, and is now on its board of directors. As well, he is chairing a new committee whose "task is to investigate the potential for opening more grades than just the early ones.

"That experience has taught me what I basically already knew. Although it is natural to be angry with the people making the decisions, the truth is the decisions are correct.

"Every parent, when they first hear bad news, is frustrated, but after you let the anger and frustration pass, you start to think constructively," Dlin said.

The school continues to have discussions with federation and Beit Rayim, Bellack-Viner said.

Registration for next year looks "good," she added after a preliminary deadline, but the final deadline will be more telling in terms of how many families are committing to staying.

PAUL MICHAELS

On May 8, Canadian Press carried an Associated Press report from Gaza City titled "Hamas 'Mickey Mouse' calls for Muslim world domination." It described a weekly Hamas children's show broadcast on Al-Aqsa TV calling for Islamic domination and "armed resistance."

Every Friday, a character innocuously named Farfour (meaning "butterfly"), a Mickey Mouse clone, incites children against Israel, Jews, the United States and the entire non-Islamic world.

In a recent episode, Farfour says: "You and I are laying the foundation for a world led by Islamists… We will return the Islamic community to its former greatness and liberate Jerusalem… liberate Iraq… and liberate all the countries of the Muslims invaded by the murderers."

Children are encouraged to call the show and engage with Farfour. According to a May 9 transcript from MEMRI (the Washington-based Middle East Media Research Institute) of an episode from last month, one child named Sanabel, when asked by Farfour to "liberate the Al-Aqsa Mosque" (i.e. Jerusalem and Palestine), replied: "We will annihilate the Jews."

Interestingly, the show has received criticism from a small number of Palestinians. Samir Zakkouf, a psychologist working with the Gaza Community Mental Health Program, denounced it for glorifying violence and creating a culture of aggression that has penetrated mainstream Palestinian society. He blamed both Israel and the Palestinians for this situation.

Basem Abu Sumaya, head of the Palestinian Broadcasting Corporation controlled by Fatah, also spoke out against the show. "I don't think it's professional, or even humane, to use children in such harsh political programs."

This is somewhat ironic, because for years, and especially after Yasser Arafat became president of the Fatah-controlled Palestinian Authority in 1994, Palestinian television and schools have been indoctrinating an entire generation with anti-Israel and anti-Semitic messages.

When Israel repeatedly voiced its objections, some of the messages might have been occasionally toned down, but Israel's concerns were met mostly with denial or indifference. (Under current PA President Mahmoud Abbas, there were inconsistent efforts to moderate this content before Hamas took over the PA in February 2005.)

It would be inaccurate to claim that Hamas alone is guilty of inciting Palestinians, and especially young people, to hate Israel and Jews. But Hamas's campaign is more pronounced than Fatah's and is backed by its charter, which not only calls for Israel's destruction but for the murder of Jews. (Contrary to popular misconception, the PLO's charter calling for Israel's destruction has never been re-written to eliminate anti-Israel clauses as promised during the Oslo peace process years.)

Countless experts have long argued that genuine peace can only occur when two peoples are prepared to live in a climate of mutual tolerance. Yet the constant Palestinian anti-Israel rhetoric is virtually guaranteed to maintain a poisonous atmosphere regarding the Jewish state.

Robert Fulford touched on the situation of incitement in a broader political context in his column, "Don't mention the war," (National Post, April 28). He referred to a discussion on Hamas TV calling for "the kidnapping of more Zionist soldiers" amid increased Qassam rocket fire into southern Israel. At the same time, Abbas was meeting in Rome with Italian Prime Minister Romano Prodi trying to secure renewed EU funding for the PA and assuring him that the Hamas rocket fire would cease. But in such an atmosphere, Fulford says, talk of normalcy and stability in the absence of responsible leadership, as in the Hamas-led PA "unity" government, is just "politics grounded in daydreams."

Without dispelling such daydreams of normalcy and ending the vicious incitement in Palestinian society, the prospects for Palestinian-Israeli reconciliation remain very bleak indeed.

By SUE EPSTEIN
Special the The CJN

Shavuot marks two important events in Judaism: the giving of the Torah on Mt. Sinai and the celebration of the spring harvest, in keeping with the description in the Book of Exodus that commanded the Israelites to gather the first fruits of their labours.

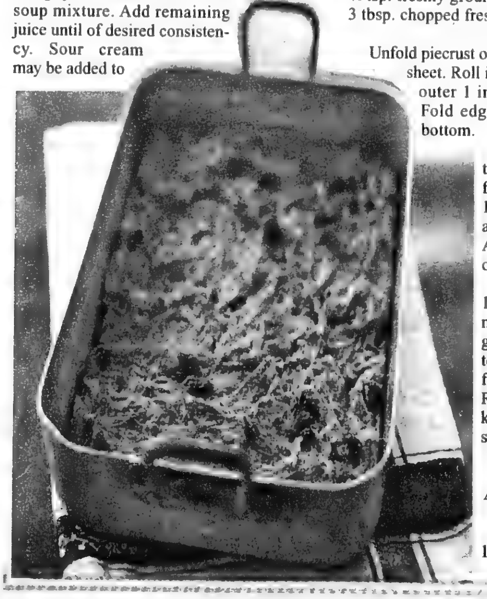
Some people have a tradition of staying up all night learning Torah and then taking a long nap before eating the holiday meal. It is also traditional to serve dairy foods and an excellent time to try out all those wonderful dairy dishes that you wouldn't take the time to make for an ordinary weekday dinner. Here are some of my favourites.

COLD STRAWBERRY SOUP

This is one of the warm weather soups I like best. Since strawberries are in season for only a short time in Israel, this soup is a special treat and a great beginning for the Shavuot meal.

1 cup sugar
½ cup cornstarch
1-1½ cups grape juice or red wine
1 cup water
1 tbsp. vanilla
2 pints strawberries
¼ cup lemon juice
½ cup orange juice concentrate
1-1½ cups additional juice (grape, orange or apple)
2 cups sour cream, optional

Mix sugar and cornstarch, then add grape juice and water. Bring to a boil, stirring constantly until thickened. Remove from heat and add vanilla. Save about half a container of the prettiest strawberries for garnish and mash the remainder. Add lemon juice and orange juice concentrate. Add to soup mixture. Add remaining juice until of desired consistency. Sour cream may be added to soup at this point if using. Chill and serve topped with strawberry slices. Makes 6 servings.



"CARDIAC" KUGEL

When you look at the list of ingredients you can see how this kugel gets its name. This is my once-a-year-on-Shavuot recipe and it's worth every single calorie and cholesterol point!

8 oz. medium noodles
½ cup butter or margarine, softened
8 eggs
½ cup sugar
½ tbsp. cinnamon
½ tbsp. allspice
4 oz. cream cheese (not whipped)
¼ lb. ricotta cheese
8 oz. sour cream or yogurt
¾ cup milk
1½ tsp. vanilla
½ cup raisins, optional

Preheat oven to 375. Grease a 9x13-inch pan. Boil noodles, drain and mix with butter or margarine until melted. Place them in prepared pan.

Beat eggs in a bowl. Mix in sugar, cinnamon and allspice. Add cream cheese, ricotta cheese and sour cream. Mix well. Pour this mixture over the noodles. Add milk, vanilla and raisins. Bake 40-60 minutes. Makes 12 servings.

TOMATO-PESTO TART

½ 15-oz. package refrigerated piecrust
2 cups shredded mozzarella cheese, divided
5 plum tomatoes, sliced
½ cup mayonnaise
¼ cup grated Parmesan cheese
2 tbsp. basil pesto
½ tsp. freshly ground pepper
3 tbsp. chopped fresh basil

Unfold piecrust on a lightly greased baking sheet. Roll into a 12-in. circle. Brush outer 1 inch of crust with water. Fold edges up and crimp. Prick bottom.

Bake crust at 425 for 8 to 10 minutes. Remove from oven. Sprinkle with 1 cup mozzarella cheese and let cool 15 minutes. Arrange tomato slices over cheese.

Stir together remaining 1 cup mozzarella cheese, mayonnaise and next 3 ingredients. Spread over tomato slices. Bake at 375 for 20 to 25 minutes. Remove from oven; sprinkle with basil. Makes 4 servings.

SMOKED SALMON AND HORSERADISH CHEESECAKE

16 oz. cream cheese, at room temperature
2 oz. cornstarch
1 oz. horseradish juice from jar of horseradish
1 tsp. salt
1 egg
4 oz. heavy cream
12 oz. diced smoked salmon
6 bagels split and toasted
1 red onion sliced thin

Preheat oven to 350. In a standing electric mixer fitted with a paddle, cream the cream cheese, cornstarch, horseradish juice and salt. Add egg and heavy cream. When filling is mixed thoroughly, add diced smoked salmon and fold it in. Place in buttered 8-in. springform pan and bake for 1 hour or until cheesecake sets up. Remove from oven and let cool to room temperature. Slice into 6 equal portions and serve with bagels and sliced onions.

Website posts messages to save Darfur

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

What more would it take to help the people of Darfur? Student activists in Yale University's law program think they've found an answer in a website they have created called "24 Hours for Darfur."

Conceived and led by Torontonian Benjamin Plener, 24, now in his second year at Yale, the site is unique in its method and aims: to compile a day's worth of 30-second video postings, sent in by people from all over the world and from all walks of life, pleading for aid for Darfur.

Once that's done, Plener and his fellow Yalies hope to spur politicians into action on the issue by taking the footage and projecting it onto screens in front of the U.S. Congress, the UN building in New York and "at other parliament buildings and embassies around the world… in a co-ordinated global launch," Plener explained to The CJN by phone from Connecticut. "In Canada, we'd do this in Ottawa on Parliament Hill."

Though not yet "officially" launched, the website is gathering steam, as Plener and his team continue to rally their friends, family members and acquaintances to the site, encouraging them to post their own messages calling for peace for Darfur.

"The bottom line is we'd like to see security for the people of Darfur, which will most likely involve the deployment of UN troops this summer," Plener said. "The diplomatic process is ramping up… But we thought the most effective way to achieve change on the ground is to open things up and try to connect the global citizen to the global policy-maker."

It's estimated that more than 400,000 civilians have died in Darfur since 2003 in an ongoing, genocidal campaign led by the government of Sudan and its Janjaweed militia.

Plener said he expects the official launch to happen within a month.

In the meantime, he's courting 24 celebrities and "prominent people," to record their own 30-second spots, which will intermingle with the rest of the footage.

Among the more than 120 clips gathered as of last week are videos from the dean of Yale Law School, Harold Hong JuKoh; author Bill Berkeley; Mark Malloch Brown, deputy secretary general of the United Nations; and Democratic national committee chair Howard Dean.

24 Hours for Darfur has no official position with regard to troop counts or deployment dates, but Plener encourages anyone who posts a message to say what they feel about the issue and share their ideas about a solution to ensure Darfur's security.

"The truth is, there are political actors who need to do different things [to help Darfur]," Plener said. "The U.S. might not be dedicating troops to any hybrid force or UN force, but it could provide financial support… lots of different actors have different roles to play. It's striking how effective advocacy can be. And we see an opportunity for high-level negotiations and perhaps another resolution in the UN Security Council in moving forward with strengthening the African Union Force."

Though Plener admits that his campaign's engine currently runs primarily on student activism from Yale, he's thrilled to see posts coming in from around the world.

"We have hits from Spain, Egypt, Israel, Europe, Australia… and that's what we're hoping will happen. That this thing will go viral and global," he said.

Plener's sister, Abby, a Grade 12 student at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, was one of the first to post a message on the site. She e-mailed The CJN about how her brother's campaign has inspired her.

"I am excited to be a part of this global movement, and to contribute to this unique form of online video advocacy," she wrote. "We can show our leaders and the people of Darfur that we will no longer sit idly while innocent people are massacred."

Jewish teacher killed in Russia in possible anti-Semitic attack

By AMIRAM BARKAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ST. PETERSBURG, Russia — A Jewish teacher in the Russian city of St. Petersburg was stabbed to death on Saturday, May 12, according to sources in the local Jewish community.

On Sunday, the St. Petersburg police arrested a suspect, the sources told Ha'aretz. Communal leaders said they believe the attack was anti-Semitic.

Dmitri Nikolasky, 22, was studying biology at a local university and teaching in a Jewish school. He was killed near the door of his apartment where he was stabbed several times in the face and chest. The suspect's arrest was reportedly based on photographs taken by the security camera at the building's entrance.

"The information available for now leads to the serious suspicion that the crime was ethnically motivated," Russia's chief rabbi, Berel Lazar, said in a statement. "The victim sustained more than a dozen stab wounds and nothing was stolen."

He added that the authorities need to get tougher when punishing racist attacks and behaviour in order to stamp them out. Members of St. Petersburg's Jewish community echoed these sentiments.

Russia has witnessed an increase in racist attacks in recent years. President Vladimir Putin has described this situation as a threat to national security and has called for the courts and police to step up their efforts to eradicate such crimes, which have included many specifically anti-Semitic incidents.

Last year, a man shouting "Heil Hitler" burst into a synagogue and stabbed nine people. In addition, Jewish graves have been desecrated with swastikas. In 2005, five teenagers beat a Jewish man to death with a metal bar.

Altogether, there have been some 200 anti-Semitic incidents in Russia and Ukraine over the last three months, according to Amos Hermon, the World Zionist Organization official in charge of the war on anti-Semitism. He added that some 50 people were killed in racist attacks in Russia in 2006.

Under Soviet rule, passports specified whether a person was Jewish and Jews often had difficulty in finding employment at top universities and in leading companies.

ADL study finds many Europeans feel Jews too powerful in business

By AMIRAM BARKAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — A study conducted by the Anti-Defamation League (ADL) among five European countries found increasing anti-Semitism, including beliefs that Jews possess too much power in business and finance.

"A large number of Europeans continue to be infected with anti-Jewish attitudes, holding onto the classical anti-Semitic canards and conspiracy theories that have dogged Jews through the centuries," the ADL said in a press release.

The study, which polled 2,714 adults in France, Italy, Germany, Spain and Poland, found that negative attitudes toward Jews increased, or in some instances, did not change, when compared to a similar study conducted in 2005.

The ADL study found that 39 per cent of respondents believe "Jews have too much power in the business world," while 44 per cent said they agree with the statement that "Jews have too much power in international financial markets."

Overall, 20 per cent of respondents said they blame Jews for the death of Jesus.

ADL national director Abraham H. Foxman said the study marks the first time that the organization decided to examine the connection between criticism of Israeli government policy and increased anti-Semitic sentiment.

At a Jerusalem press conference, Foxman said the results prove there is indeed a link between the two.

"We still can't say how reservations about Israeli policy affect the anti-Jewish sentiment and to what extent, but the fact that there is a relationship between the two phenomena is significant," he said.

Fifty-one per cent of respondents said they feel Jews are more loyal to Israel than to their home country.

Twenty-five per cent said their opinion of Jews is influenced by Israel's actions, and 52 per cent of those said Israel's actions have made their views on Jews more negative.

Responding to a reporter's question, Foxman said "biased media coverage" of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is a contributing factor to anti-Semitic beliefs among the public.

In addition, nearly half of all respondents, including a majority of respondents from Spain and Poland, said they believe American Jews control the United States' foreign policy in the Middle East.

"The findings of this survey demonstrate that individual governments and the European Union, who have condemned anti-Semitism and sought ways to counteract it, need to find methods and implement programs that will break down the old stereotypes that die hard, and take leadership to make anti-Semitism unacceptable in their societies," Foxman said.

The survey also examined the respondents' attitudes toward the Palestinian unity government and the Iranian nuclear issue.

"A majority identified Hamas as a terrorist organization and supports the European decision not to provide foreign aid to the Palestinian government until Hamas renounces terrorism and recognizes Israel and agreements signed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority," the ADL reported.

However, a majority also said they do not believe Israel had the right to respond militarily to the abduction of its soldiers last summer.

Regarding Iran, 67 per cent of respondents said they believe Iran's nuclear program is at least partially military in nature, and only 14 per cent said the program is intended solely for civilian energy purposes.

PM pledges NIS 5.75B to develop Jerusalem

By JONATHAN LIS
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Prime Minister Ehud Olmert pledged Sunday to allocate NIS 5.75 billion ($1.45 billion US) for urban development projects in Jerusalem over the next five years. However, knowledgeable sources maintained that Olmert was merely announcing the transfer of funds that had been promised to the capital in previous years, for projects that had already been approved.

"The claim that [Olmert] 'strengthened' the city by more than NIS 5 billion is defrauding the public," said one of the officials involved in the plans, which were made public ahead of Jerusalem Day on Wednesday. "All in all, Olmert put a check mark next to plans and initiatives that were approved in the past, and presented them like a new plan. In reality, aside from the cancellation of the employers' tax [for non-profit associations], which is worth some NIS 300 million [$75 million US), and an addition of a few million shekels a year – there is nothing new here."

In addition to the revocation of the employers' tax, the projects include the transfer of all government ministries to Jerusalem within the next eight years, the rehabilitation of the Atarot industrial zone, the construction of a new courthouse complex and the establishment of educational institutions dedicated to the study of Jerusalem.

Olmert, a former mayor of Jerusalem, made the announcement at the weekly cabinet meeting, which was held at the capital's Menachem Begin Heritage Center in honour of the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem.

The officials involved in the plans said the annual government grant meant to strengthen Jerusalem is between NIS 35 million ($9 million US) and NIS 50 million ($12.5 million US) less than the amount allocated in the last few years.

A source in the Prime Minister's Office confirmed that the NIS 5.75 billion did not refer exclusively to new projects, and said Olmert did not try to hide this at the cabinet meeting. Rather, the source said, the prime minister used the sum to illustrate the extent of the aid the government grants Jerusalem and the importance of supporting the capital.

Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski said during the meeting that the capital was not receiving enough support and warned that Hamas could triumph in the city with a demographic victory in the future.

"We must deal today not with crumbs, but with a real Marshall Plan to strengthen the Jewish citizens of the city," said Lupolianski, referring to the 1947 U.S. aid package that helped put Europe on its feet after World War II.

Lupolianski cited statistical data as indicating that within 12 years, the Hamas movement would be able to take over the mayoralty, once the Arabs become a majority in the city.

"Jerusalem, God forbid, is liable to not be under Jewish sovereignty, but under that of the Hamas movement – which knows that it won't need to conquer Jerusalem in war, but on the demographic issue," the mayor said.

Uri Lupolianski

Ehud Olmert

Yaakov Edri, the minister for Jerusalem affairs, said his ministry is planning to publicize a long-range plan that is supposed to reduce the gaps between east Jerusalem and west Jerusalem, and to encourage young couples to live in the city. The scheme is awaiting Finance Ministry approval, which the ministry expects to receive within a few weeks.

Slated to be implemented over the next decade, the plan requires a "huge" budgetary investment, said Edri. "In order to minimize the gaps, you have to invest," he added.

Until they accept responsibility

By SHLOMO AVINERI

Comment

The Palestinians will mark the annual Nakba Day on May 15, as they have done in previous years. We must listen to their voices. As human beings and as Jews we must listen and be attentive to the other's pain, even if the other is – at the moment – our enemy. However, we must listen critically.

First and foremost we may ask, why May 15? It was on this day that the British Mandate on Palestine ended and the State of Israel was established. But the United Nations' resolution of Nov. 29, 1947, also stipulates that an Arab state was to be established on part of Palestine this very same day. This resolution gave the seal of international approval to erecting two nation states on the controversial territory of mandatory Palestine.

Do the Palestinians mention this along with their rejection of the compromise resolution proposed by the international community, in the form of the partition plan?

With all due understanding and empathy to the Palestinians' suffering, the way the Nakba, the "catastrophe," is presented in the Palestinian and pan-Arab narrative raises several questions. It is portrayed as something terrible and evil that happened to the Palestinians. There is not even an iota of introspection, self-criticism and readiness to deal with the Palestinians' own contribution to their catastrophe.

We can understand – without justifying it - the Palestinians' rejection of the partition plan, just as we can understand – without justifying it – the Revisionist Zionist position negating the partition. But most of the Jewish community accepted the idea. And if most of the Palestinians had accepted it, then an independent Palestinian state would have risen on part of Mandatory Palestine in 1948, without war and without refugees.

The Palestinians are not prepared to deal with this complex reality. After 1948, quite a few books were written in Arabic about the Arabs' defeat in their war against Israel. To this day no book has raised the question of whether, perhaps, the Arabs erred in rejecting the compromise - painful as it may be – of the partition? Perhaps they would have done better if, like the Zionists, they had gritted their teeth and accepted the half-full glass?

A much-used expression in Jewish tradition says "because of our sins we were exiled from our land." This expression is religious, but it indicates that the Jews viewed their exile in a self-critical manner. It would have been easy, of course, to blame the Romans and the other nations for their fate. But the Jewish narrative did not do so and viewed both the destruction and exile as deriving, among other things, from the Jews' own actions and shortcomings.

Every nation, especially a defeated one, sees itself as a victim. But most of the nations that were defeated – Germany after World War II is the classic example – also looked at themselves, at their society, values and actions.

Far be it from me to maintain that in 1948 the Jews were "right" and the Arabs were "wrong." What troubles me and other Zionist Israelis wishing to be attentive to the Palestinians' pain and willing to help rectify injustices and accept a historic compromise, is the Palestinians' complete unwillingness to acknowledge that in 1948 they and their leaders made a terrible historic mistake – of both political and moral proportions – by rejecting the international compromise they were offered.

It is for this reason that the Palestinians' customary comparison between the Nakba and the Holocaust is so outrageous. Did the Jews of Germany and Europe declare war on Germany? Were the world's Jews offered a compromise that they rejected? Europe's Jews were murdered by the Nazis because they were Jews. What does that have to do with the Palestinians' decision to refuse the UN's compromise proposal and go to war?

It would not be exaggerated to say that there will be no true compromise between Israel and the Palestinians without a readiness on their part – however minute and partial, for the "truth" is always complex – to admit that they, too, are partly responsible for what happened to them in 1948.

March of Living disbursed questionable payments: report

JTA staff

NEW YORK — The Claims Conference says it will not release any more funds to the March of the Living until the Holocaust education program proves that it runs a "clean operation," according to the chairman of the Claims Conference.

Julius Berman made his comments days after the New York Jewish Week reported that the March of the Living disbursed some $700,000 (US) in questionable payments to a close associate of Israel's suspended finance minister and of Rabbi Israel Singer, the president of the Claims Conference.

Curtis Hoxter has ties to Israeli Finance Minister Abraham Hirchson, who has stepped down while being investigated for corruption, and Rabbi Singer, who was fired from the World Jewish Congress in March over allegations of financial impropriety.

Rabbi Singer remains president of the Claims Conference, an umbrella organization that oversees the allocation of restitution payments from the Holocaust-era. The money comes from governments and institutions that were complicit in victimizing Jews during and after the Holocaust. Billions of dollars have been allocated to survivors and their heirs, with a small percentage going to groups involved in Holocaust education and research.

March of the Living, a Jewish identity program that takes Jewish teens to Holocaust sites in Poland and then to Israel, receives major funding from the Claims Conference – more than $7.4 million since 1998.

According to the Jewish Week's joint investigation with the Israeli business publication Globes, March of the Living began payments to Hoxter totalling $709,000 in 2003. That was the same year Rabbi Singer "was instructed to stop funnelling unauthorized payments to him via the World Jewish Congress – payments that by then had totaled $657,600," the Jewish Week reported.

Tax records showed that March of the Living payments to Hoxter took place over three years and purportedly were for fundraising services. But Hoxter has never registered with the New York State attorney general as a fundraiser or fundraising counsel, and said he did not recall specifics of what he did for the payments he received.

"It was a minor activity," Hoxter, 85, is quoted as saying. "I did fundraising, basically an activity to advise them to run a campaign in the U.S."

Rabbi Singer has denied any wrongdoing. His son Eliezer relayed a statement from his father to the Jewish Week saying, "I'm not involved in allocating Claims Conference funds, and certainly have no say or interest in any consultants that grant recipients might choose to hire."

Claims Conference officials say Rabbi Singer has never had any role in its allocations process. His primary role is to negotiate with governments on restitution issues.

The Claims Conference, which supplied grants to March of the Living even before Rabbi Singer was president, provides funds to the group exclusively for scholarships to bridge the gap between what the trip costs and what a student can pay, said Berman, the Claims Conference chairman.

Last week, the Claims Conference announced its in-house financial controller, Yigal Molad, was launching an "in-depth audit" of grants it had made to March of the Living in response to the Israeli police investigation of Hirchson and other allegations.

Herod's tomb found

By EDGAR ASHER
CJN Israel Bureau

JERUSALEM — The long search for Herod the Great's tomb has ended with the exposure of the remains of his grave, sarcophagus and mausoleum on Mount Herodion's northeastern slope, Ehud Netzer of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem Institute of Archaeology announced last week.

Herod was the Roman-appointed king of Judea from 37 to 4 BCE, who was renowned for his many monumental building projects, including the reconstruction of the Temple in Jerusalem and the palace at Masada, as well as the complex at Herodion, 15 kilometres south of Jerusalem.

Herodion is the site where Herod chose to be buried and to memorialize himself, "all of this with the integration of a huge, unique palace at the fringe of the desert," said Netzer. "Therefore the exposure of his tomb becomes the climax of this site's research."

The approach to the burial site – which has been described by the archeologists involved as one of the most striking finds in Israel in recent years – was via a monumental flight of stairs 6½ metres wide, leading to the hillside. The stairs were especially constructed for the funeral procession.

The excavations on the slope of the mountain, at whose top is the famed structure comprising a palace, a fortress and a monument, commenced in August 2006. The expedition, on behalf of the Institute of Archaeology of the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, was conducted by Netzer, Yaakov Kalman and Roi Porath, with the assistance of local Bedouins.

"The location and unique nature of the findings, as well as the historical record, leave no doubt that this was Herod's burial site," said Netzer.

Worthy of note is the fact that the sarcophagus was broken into hundreds of pieces, no doubt deliberately. The breaking of the sarcophagus, along with the destruction of the monument, apparently took place in the years 66-72 CE, during the first Jewish revolt against the Romans, while Jewish rebels took hold of the site, according to the historian Josephus and the archeological evidence. The rebels were known for their hatred of Herod and all that he stood for, as a "puppet ruler" for the Romans.

The search for Herod's tomb, which actively began 30 years ago, focused at lower Herodion until the middle of 2006.

Sarkozy won strong Jewish backing

By RINA BASSIST
JTA

PARIS — The 53 per cent support for Nicolas Sarkozy in the second round of France's presidential election was the strongest showing by a right-wing candidate since Charles de Gaulle – perhaps because he was the man who finally cut down far-right extremist Jean-Marie Le Pen.

Nicolas Sarkozy

Nonna Mayer, a professor at the prestigious Institute for Political Studies in Paris, noted that in the first round of voting on April 23, Sarkozy took more than one-third of far-right voters. In the May 6 runoff, it jumped to two-thirds, as well as 40 per cent of centrist votes.

"His victory is so convincing in the sense that only a quarter of his voters chose him just in order to prevent Royal from the presidency," Mayer said, referring to Sarkozy's Socialist Party opponent, Ségolène Royal.

"Among Royal voters, some 47 per cent voted not for her but against her rival – anyone but Sarkozy."

Sammy Ghozlan, president of the Union of Jewish Communities in the Paris region, congratulated Sarkozy for "his brilliant election as president of the republic." Ghozlan also heads an agency that fights anti-Semitism and has commended Sarkozy's firm stance on the issue.

"We are persuaded that the new president will continue eradicating anti-Semitism the way he has begun doing," Ghozlan said. "We will remain his partners in his efforts to construct civil peace here in France, and we assure him of our total confidence and support in his actions to establish peace between Israel and its neighbours."

Sarkozy could hardly ask for more. Despite the French Republic's official discouragement of sectoral politics, the Jewish community strongly supported Sarkozy.

Jewish voters saw the former interior minister as a friend to Israel and an important figure in the fight against anti-Semitism. Soon after Royal conceded, Jewish groups came out with their good wishes.

Sarkozy, the grandson of a Greek Jew and the son of a Hungarian aristocrat, has pledged to make it tougher for immigrants to bring their extended families to France. Among the economic reforms he has pledged are the abolition of a tax on overtime, a cut in the inheritance tax and measures to force the unemployed to take whatever work is offered.

Considered a law-and-order politician in the American mold, Sarkozy earned points in the Jewish community for his hard line against Muslim unrest in France, including riots and anti-Semitic attacks.

Sarkozy was one of the first French politicians to react strongly to a spike in anti-Semitic attacks in France after the Palestinian intifadah began in 2000 at a time when other French officials did not seem to take the problem seriously.

The Jewish community's respect for Sarkozy was demonstrated by absentee voting results from French Jews living in Israel. Sarkozy received 5,655 of the votes cast at the French Embassy in Tel Aviv – more than 90 per cent – compared to just 580 for Royal.

That's even greater support than the 87 per cent Sarkozy received in his hometown of Neuilly-sur-Seine, where he has served as mayor. The Tel Aviv figures reportedly top those voting for Sarkozy in any other French voting bureau around the world.

The victory may well reflect a change in French political life. The phenomenon of right-wing extremist Le Pen making the runoff, as he did in 2002, is over, and France has returned to its traditional left-right balance. Royal's Socialists lost the presidential election for the third time in a row, and the internal battle over the party's leadership is yet to begin.

Sources in the Jewish community say the shift back to a right-left balance is due in part to Sarkozy's obstinate fight against anti-Semitism and racism. In April 2002 elections, 18 per cent of French voters chose Le Pen, sending his anti-immigrant message – which in the past has included anti-Semitism and Holocaust denial – into the second round.

This year, in contrast, French voters elected a candidate whose father was an immigrant. Even most female voters chose Sarkozy, polls showed, despite Royal's blatant plea for women to show gender solidarity.

Jews traditionally have supported the Socialists, but this year several Jews interviewed said no Socialist leader, including former president Francois Mitterrand, had succeeded in bringing Le Pen to his knees as Sarkozy did, perhaps ending Le Pen's political career.

Sarkozy told of a difficult childhood in which he was hassled because of his unusual family name. In his inauguration speech, he spoke of building a new France where no one would feel excluded, regardless of his or her origin or beliefs.

Sarkozy's tactics may not have been to the liking of some Jews – Simone Veil, a Holocaust survivor and former Cabinet minister backed Sarkozy even though she deplored his call for a "national identity and immigration ministry" – but the results can't be contested.

Israeli, Palestinian researchers develop test for learning disabilities

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Despite ongoing tension between Israel and the Palestinians, Israeli and Palestinian academics from Haifa University and Al-Quds University in eastern Jerusalem have completed a joint research project.

Funded by a $1.5-million U.S. government grant, it led to the development of a diagnostic test for learning disabilities and fostered personal friendships.

Zvia Breznitz, one of the researchers, said that the six-year project proves that Israelis and Arabs can coexist.

"I think that the way to live in peace is to get to know one another and not just talk about peace," said Breznitz, the director of the Center for Brain Research and Learning Disabilities at Haifa University.

In an interview from Haifa, she added: "We always talk about grandiose ideas such as peace and love and never make any progress. But if a connection starts with a specific, professional project, at the end of the day, friendships are established. In my opinion, this is the recipe for coexistence."

Breznitz, who has maintained professional and social ties with her Palestinian colleagues since the completion of the project recently, said that the test will be introduced to Israeli Jewish, Israeli Arab and Palestinian schools come this September.

She described it as the first in Israel and the Palestinian territories to identify and diagnose learning disabilities in the classroom.

In general, she noted, one quarter of people in the developed world suffer from a learning disability. But among Israeli Arabs, the rate is higher.

"It is possible that this does not stem directly from learning disabilities but from cultural deprivation," she explained. "For this reason, a test for the identification and diagnosis of learning disabilities was so important."

The co-operative project, officially known as the Wye River People-To-People Exchange Program, was launched a year after the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising in September 2000.

Its objective was to foster Israeli-Palestinian dialogue on a scientific basis.

It was Breznitz who suggested that the funds, allocated by the United States, should be used to develop a diagnostic test that could be administered in both Israel and the Palestinian Authority (the West Bank and Gaza Strip).

"The aim was to provide learning opportunities for every pupil," she said. "Since there were no normative tests for the diagnosis of learning disabilities in Hebrew and Arabic, we decided to create such a diagnostic system."

By agreement, the researchers were not allowed to discuss politics.

Israel Briefs

Livni advances talks

Tzipi Livni visited Egypt to set up talks between Israel and the Arab League. The Israeli foreign minister met her Egyptian and Jordanian counterparts, as well as Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak, in Cairo last week as part of recent attempts at rapprochement between Jerusalem and the Arab League. The regional bloc is trying to convince Israel to support a Saudi-led proposal for a regional peace deal, but those talks have been held up by the Israeli political crisis surrounding the commission of inquiry on the Lebanon war, as well as Arab League intransigence on amending the plan. Livni and her interlocutors agreed that an Arab League working group comprising representatives of Egypt and Jordan would travel to Israel in the coming weeks for preliminary negotiations.

24 Sudanese reach Israel

Twenty-four Sudanese refugees reached Israel. The group of men, women and children, apparently fleeing the slaughter in their country's Darfur region, arrived in Be'er Sheva last week after slipping in from Egypt. Their arrival stirred a bureaucratic debate in Israel, with neither the military nor police wanting to detain them and the Interior Ministry unsure about how to accommodate illegal migrants from a country classified as an enemy. Some 250 Sudanese have sought refuge in Israel over the past year. Most are in jail while the government discusses asylum options, but a small number have been placed in temporary kibbutz homes.

Millions to go for Darfur

Israel reportedly is planning to donate $5 million (US) to Darfur refugees. Ha'aretz reported that the aid recommendations must be approved by the Foreign Ministry. Thousands of refugees have fled from Sudan to neighbouring Chad. The department suggested giving $4 million to the United Nations Refugee Agency, the UN Children's Fund, the World Food Program and the Red Cross; sending $800,000 worth of medicine and water-purifying supplies to refugee camps; and donating $150,000 to IsraAID, Ha'aretz reported. Government-backed Arab militias have killed hundreds of thousands and displaced millions in the ongoing conflict in Darfur.

Ban sees closer UN ties

The UN secretary general said he wants to improve the world body's relationship with Israel and increase Israeli involvement in UN activities. Ban Ki-moon said he attaches "great importance to strengthening the relationship between the United Nations and Israel. I view Israel as a full member of the community of member states, with the same rights and obligations as any other. Israel also has a wealth of experience to offer the organization, and much to gain by participating in the UN's efforts for peace, development and human rights."

The U.S. dollar hit a seven-year low against the shekel. The U.S. currency was valued at 3.996 shekels last Monday, the first time it has sunk below the 4-shekel mark since 2000. Analysts cited the dollar's international slump as well as Israel's strong economy. The exchange rate is bad news for Americans visiting Israel, though it has meant a frenzy of spending on imports and real estate in the Jewish state.

Israel subsidizes flights

Israel will keep regular flights going to Egypt and Jordan by increasing government subsidies on the politically sensitive routes. Ha'aretz reported that security costs for the flights are unusually high and El Al loses some $5 million annually on the routes, although the government already foots half the bill. "The existence of regular flights to and from Egypt and Jordan is of primary importance in the political sense," Transportation Minister Shaul Mofaz said.

Beckham coming to Israel

Spanish soccer powerhouse Real Madrid, and its star David Beckham, will be in Israel June 19 for a soccer friendly against a joint Israeli-Palestinian team, Israeli media reported. Beckham and Real will be guests of the Peres Center for Peace, founded by Nobel Peace laureate Shimon Peres in 1996 to encourage co-operation between Israelis and Palestinians. – Files from JTA

Book helps moms to document children's early years

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Judy Siblin-Librach says her new book Love, Mommy: Writing Love Letters to Your Baby, (ECW Press) started off as the hormonal meanderings of a new mother.

The author, life coach and CJN columnist says that she was so overjoyed when her son Max, now 9, was born that if she was a dancer she would have created a dance, "but I'm a writer, so I wrote."

Judy Siblin-Librach

At first the writing had no shape, she says, but eventually it took the form of love letters.

Also the mother of Lily, age 7, Siblin-Librach says that the love for one's children "is the most unconditional and holy love of all, and I was swept away. Letters are a lovely way to let them know my feelings.

"It is also a way for children to learn about early moments in their lives, moments for which they have no memory. This is a way of giving them these memories."

When children read about them later on, she says, they'll learn about such milestones as coming home from the hospital, taking their first bath or their first steps, speaking their first words, and about how she felt at the time.

"Verbal stories are wonderful, but when they're written down, they're forever."

Love Mommy: Writing Love Letters to Your Baby is a tool for other mothers to document the special memories and milestones of their child's early years, Siblin-Librach says. "I want them to accomplish this labour of love, and it's never too late. If your kids are older, you can reach back into your memory and capture [certain stories] on paper."

In addition to letters to her own children, the book contains writing tips – don't procrastinate, keep a sense of humour – and suggestions for topics. "Topics can be about everyday events such as the look my son gave me on the first day of school, or the pink hat my daughter wore on the first day of summer camp. These are topics that will make us all smile when we look back."

At a workshop she held about her book, she asked mothers at what moment they knew "they had become a mother for sure, and that there was no going back.

"Quite often it is a quiet moment between you and your child. My moment with Max was when I gave him his first bath by myself. I could feel that he had put his whole trust in me."

In her letter to Max about that bath, she told him that "it was as if all time had stopped and we were the only two people in the world. You stared at me with such intensity that I was caught off guard. Your look said, 'I love you and trust you completely.'"

Before her letters were made into a book, Siblin-Librach had shoeboxes and cartons and envelopes bursting at the seams. "Finally I [put them together] and bound them into two separate books, one for each of my children," she says.

Eventually, it became a 400-page book, which had to be shortened to 140 pages. "It was a daunting task, but it was the right thing to do because I want it to be a gift suitable for every mother, and it can be a lovely project for a grandmother or aunt."

"Imagine giving a loved one a piece of your heart. There is nothing like it."

LAG B'OMER: Students at the south campus of the Leo Baeck Day School celebrated Lag b'Omer with an outdoor fun day. At the school, the day is also known as Leo Baeck Day to connect the heroism of Rabbi Leo Baeck during the Holocaust to that of other heroes in Jewish history. Project Campfire sends terror victims to camp

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Three friends with a passion for summer camp have joined to help send terror victims to camp in Israel.

Jason Kimel, 31, Ira Pettle, 29, and Ari Laskin, 23, who met at Camp Winnebagoe in Huntsville, Ont., are raising money for Project Campfire, on behalf of One Family Fund, an organization that provides direct financial, legal, and emotional assistance to victims of terror in Israel.

Pettle said the idea for Project Campfire came about from his desire to "help kids, help Israel and help One Family Fund. I wanted to make a positive difference. I approached Jason and Ari and they were inspired, and the fire kept growing."

Jason, a lawyer, said he has had an appreciation for camping from a young age, and his life's goal is to get involved in it. "Camp is tremendous for youngsters' self-esteem and confidence. When Ira approached me, I jumped right on board."

Laskin said he was captivated by the idea. "My interest was twofold. I was looking to get involved in a charity, and I appreciate camping because the skills I learned have had a huge impact on my life.

"Kids need the option of going to camp, and Project Campfire can help them get there."

Kimelman said they are working with several camps in Israel, and eventually they would like to expand the grassroots organization to help kids in Ontario, too.

Project Campfire's first fundraising event will be a party on June 21 at the Revival Bar. For information, call Pettle at 416-737 3666.

Q. I have noticed lately that a lot of grocery products have a number of different health-related labels. Why is this?

A. This is certainly a growing trend. I am pleased to say that we are in an increasingly good place in nutrition in Canada right now, and it is only getting better for consumers, as I see it.

About Nutrition

An ever-widening variety of products are available at all price points in all supermarkets to appeal to many nutrition and health needs, from vegetarian, organic and natural foods, to health-based ones that are lactose free, nut free, gluten-free, low sodium, sugar free, trans-fat free and high fibre. There are several reasons for this.

I believe this trend is due partly to an increased interest in the market, driven to some degree by the baby boomers now in their 50s and 60s, who have a desire to extend the middle years of their lives. Thanks to medical advances, the boomers realize that they will likely live longer than their parents did, and they want to be healthier as they age. As a major market share, they are more and more interested in their bones, their heart, their blood pressure and disease prevention, in general. This creates a great demand for healthy products that are prevention-oriented, and thus healthier foods are emerging on the scene almost daily.

I believe another factor behind the current trend is the push to prevent childhood obesity, which has propelled the food industry to offer healthier, lower fat foods geared to kids and families.

While we still have to be enlightened shoppers and carefully read labels for misleading claims or names, we do have an increasingly great array of truly healthful foods available to us all across the country.

A related trend that you will notice growing over the next year will be improvements in restaurant foods and more nutrition disclosure and information about the foods available when you eat out. This, too, is a positive and important piece of the move to improve our overall nutrition.

Diverse images from Jewish, Muslim photographers

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Cultural and religious diversity.

The burdens of war.

The ugliness of intolerance.

The beauty of childhood.

These are among the themes of A Light Unto the Nations, a new photographic exhibition featuring the work of Jews and Muslims.

The show, which runs until May 20, is at the Lennox Contemporary Gallery, which sits in an immigrant neighbourhood of Vietnamese restaurants and Portuguese tile and household stores in the west end of Toronto.

Gilad Benari's photographs are strong and stark.

Gilad Benari's Co-Existence

In A Prayer for Tomorrow, three fervent Orthodox Jewish men pray on a deserted Tel Aviv beach at dusk, their backs to a blood-red sky streaked with shades of blue and black.

Kitra Cahana's photographs zero in on intense Christian worshippers in Jerusalem, an Ethiopian monk reading a book at Jerusalem's Church of the Holy Sepulchre, three Palestinian girls enjoying ice cream cones in the shadow of a 19th century windmill, and a Jewish man at prayer during Lag b'Omer in Meron.

Her ensemble of photographs from Ethiopia focuses on Falash Mora Jews in Addis Ababa waiting to immigrate to Israel.

Steve Simon went to an Aryan Nations gathering in Idaho and brought back chilling photos of its members and of a parade in which young neo-Nazis strut out their naked chests in defiance.

Simon's clear and unambiguous message is that racial hatred brews in the hearts and minds of some Americans.

The images of Sawsan Yassine emphasize esthetics. A woman with an embroidered head shawl leaves a powerful impression. A woman biting into the morsel of a nut also stops you in your tracks.

Lamaya Gargash's stunning photograph cries out for attention. The face of a woman is partially covered with paper on which appears flowing Arab letters. It seems like a protest against the oppression of women in parts of the Arab world.

The Lennox Contemporary Gallery is at 12 Ossington Ave., just north of Queen St. W. Hours are from noon to 5 p.m.

Joy Fielding's latest novel is about bullying

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The pride of the Canadian Jewish writing community, Joy Fielding, is celebrating the release of her latest thriller, Heartstopper, which is being praised by fans and critics alike.

The novel, which is set in Torrance, Fla., a town of less than 5,000 people, is about a series of disappearances and murders of the prettiest girls in town – the so-called heartstoppers.

Throughout the novel, the serial killer teases readers with his journal entries, which describe the chilling process of kidnapping and murdering the young girls.

Sandy Crosbie, a high-school English teacher, who followed her cheating husband to Florida from New York, becomes invested in the search for the serial killer when her beautiful daughter goes missing, too.

While the plot has to do with the murders, thematically, it is a book about bullying and its various guises, Fielding said.

"I related to the theme because of what I had been reading about Internet bullying and also just some of the stories I'd read in the paper – you know, the whole Reena Virk incident [a 14-year-old girl who was bullied and beaten to death by a group of teens] and some of the other incidents of high school bullying," said the bestselling author of novels, including Puppet and Mad River Road.

"In general, I feel the media and society tend to bully women into thinking that they have to look a certain way in order to be attractive and there is only one increasingly narrow standard of beauty and just the way that women are bullied in other aspects of their lives, into doing things they are uncomfortable with doing."

Although Heartstopper was only released about a month ago, Fielding has already been getting positive feedback from her readers.

"So far they're responding very well. Heartstopper is on all the bestseller lists. I think they'll really enjoy it. I think it's a very strong book, it covers a wide range of characters and age groups and types and I think it gets into the head of all those characters quite well."

Fielding, a former actress who got to kiss Elvis Presley when she landed a role in an episode of Gunsmoke in the 1960s, had her first novel, The Best of Friends, published in 1972. Since then, she's written almost 20 novels and said that she always tries to make each book different from the last.

"This one is different in the sense that it is a real thriller and it's told from a multi-person point of view… but this one mixes up first person and third person and moves around in age and sex," said Fielding, a Toronto native who splits her time between Toronto and Florida.

Israeli film focuses on terrorism in Jerusalem

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Close to Home, an Israeli drama due to open commercially in Toronto on May 18, focuses on the here-and-now of Israel's perpetual battle against terrorism.

Directed by Dalia Hager and Vidi Bilu, and inspired by their own experiences in the Israeli army, Close to Home leaves little to the imagination in describing the daily perils Israel faces to protect itself.

The first few minutes set the tone.

Two female soldiers at a checkpoint examine a Palestinian woman who has aroused their suspicion. They find nothing of interest, but the intrusive inspection is a source of distaste to one particular soldier.

The camera then pans on a room where their commanding officer berates them for a poor performance. Her wrath is focused on Smadar (Smadar Savar), a rebellious type, and Mirit (Neama Shendar), an introvert.

By way of punishment, she hands them a lousy mission. They are assigned to patrol the streets of Jerusalem, check the papers of Palestinians and register the details in special forms.

As the film unfolds, Smadar and Mirit stop a number of Palestinian men for questioning. But one of their commanding officers takes them to task for not fulfilling their quota. In truth, Smadar is a slacker who does not comprehend the seriousness of her job.

Neama Shendar and Smadar Savar in Close to Home

A suicide bombing brings Smadar to her senses. It is a well-executed scene. The frantic sirens of ambulances sound. Smoke rises from the pavement. Police set up barricades. The cries and screams of victims resound.

Mirit, stunned by the impact of the explosion, lies quietly on the street. A handsome stranger tends to her. Romantically smitten by him, she later tries to track him down.

Close to Home, which was screened at the Toronto Jewish Film Festival, concentrates on the spectre of terrorism, both on the streets and in the buses of Jerusalem.

It also tries to flesh out the lives of Smadar and Mirit when they are out of uniform, but this dimension seems padded and is unnecessary.

Clearly, Close to Home deals with an important topic, but the tension that should be at its core is missing.

From this perspective, it falls short of the mark.

Now's editor, Alice Klein, segues into filmmaking

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

After nearly 25 years as a journalist, Alice Klein knew it was time for a change.

"I kind of needed to take on another creative challenge," said Klein, the co-founder, editor and chief executive officer of Now, the biggest alternative news and entertainment weekly in Toronto.

That moment dawned two summers ago when, in a more or less spontaneous burst of inspiration, she decided to make her first film. The documentary, Call of the Hummingbird, which was shot in central Brazil and had its debut at last month's Hot Docs festival in Toronto, deals with the degradation of the environment.

"I don't remember not being interested in this topic," said Klein, speaking a day after a United Nations panel released a report warning that the world has only 15 years to stabilize the growth of greenhouse-gas emissions.

In her film, which she describes as a "full-frontal eco manifesto," Klein warns that we're on a collision course with nature and that if we we do not shape up soon we could well place ourselves on a trajectory course toward extinction.

Long a social activist and feminist who passionately holds that nature is "our only teacher," Klein is nevertheless optimistic that the situation can be reversed through a much better awareness of and concern with the planet's fragility and prompt and uncompromising action by governments.

"Optimism is the only useful position to take because the alternative is a prescription for utter despair, which leads to inaction and is ethically untenable," said Klein. "We, as humans, don't see ourselves as part of nature. We don't have a democratic relationship with life on the planet. We're deeply out of balance with reality."

Klein's impetus for making Call of the Hummingbird was a gathering of earth lovers in a jungle clearing where waterfalls tumble down crystal mountains. Having interviewed some of the participants, ranging from ecologists to holistic health workers, she made a last-minute decision to attend and record the proceedings.

Although she was a rank neophyte as a filmmaker, she had sufficient confidence in herself as a storyteller to pull it off. "So it was a pretty experimental thing," she said in an interview at a mid-town café popular with university students and 1960s-type bohemians.

Flying down to Brazil with a small crew, Klein spent three weeks in a temporary eco village to observe whether these tree huggers, ecologists and flower children could get along and adjust to nature harmoniously. Amid flooding, sickness, the formation of cliques and the piling up of garbage, she discovered that even the best of intentions can go awry.

"I really enjoyed this new, wonderful, exciting artistic medium," said Klein, who financed the film. "It was a learning process."

Klein hopes to make another film, but hasn't settled on a theme as yet. In the meantime, she tends to her duties at Now, a free pickup newspaper with a circulation of about 350,000 and a freewheeling, leftish philosophy.

She and Now's co-founder and publisher, Michael Hollett, met at York University when he was the editor of the campus newspaper Excalibur and she was pursuing an MA in social history that she never finished.

Asked who dreamed up Now, she replied, "We were driving along one day and Michael said, 'Hey, we should start our own newspaper, like the Village Voice,' and I said, "Great.'"

Back then, they were an unmarried couple, he a speechwriter for the Workman's Compensation Board and she – a graduate of Harbord Collegiate and the University of Toronto – a housewife. She and Hollett were romantically involved but never married, though they would have two daughters. Although their personal relationship eventually ended, they remained business partners.

They started Now in 1981 heavily in debt and with six employees. The first edition, a mix of music, movie and theatre reviews and of lifestyle and political pieces with an iconoclastic twist, set its tone.

Klein, who helped start a short-lived feminist publication titled The Velvet Fist when she in a high school, never imagined that she would enter mainstream journalism.

She was simply too left-wing. Today, however, she is fed up with what she annoyingly calls "self-righteous politics on either end of the spectrum."

Now, with currently 120 employees, broke even after a year and a half and turned profitable soon afterward. "We were really good journalists, but it took a while for us to become business people."

As the custodian of its left-liberal editorial values, Klein promotes multiculturalism and a respect for human rights and condemns racism and xenophobia.

Now's coverage of the Arab-Israeli dispute has angered some readers, who claim that it is partial toward the Palestinian cause. Klein, who considers herself culturally Jewish and has visited Israel once, opposes Israel's occupation but wishes Israelis and Palestinians well.

"On both sides, there is terrible suffering. My heart goes out to the Jewish and Palestinian victims of this violence. I want them to find as non-violent solution."

Klein considers herself "a child of the Holocaust" by virtue of her parents' past. Nicholas, her late father, was a Prague lawyer whose entire family was wiped out by the Nazis. Elizabeth, her mother, was born in Berlin into a Catholic family of partial Jewish ancestry. Facing oppression, they fled to Mexico, where they met, married and conceived Klein and her two sisters, Jeanette, a psychologist, and Heidi, a holistic educator.

The murder of her father's family left a deep and lasting impact on Klein. "My views," she mused, "were formed by that experience."

She said that when she gets feedback from her fans, most applaud her ability to create characters with whom they can easily relate.

Fielding thinks the reason her fans relate so well to her characters, despite the fact that most will never find themselves in the same situations as the characters, is because they identify with their basic human emotions.

Joy Fielding

"We're all basically similar. We're much more alike than we are different, and we all feel hate and love and fear and the feeling of being trapped and unsure and depressed and lonely and angry and happy. I think when I create the characters I make them believable," Fielding said.

"What I've always done in my fiction is try to put myself in the position of the particular character and try to imagine how I might feel or what I might do in a certain situation."

In the case of Heartstopper, Fielding's challenge was to get into the head of a cold-blooded murderer who loved to watch his victims suffer.

"This character is obviously darker and hopefully not part of my psyche at all, but I've done enough reading over the years and I've really done a lot of what I call casual research. So I know a lot about sociopaths and that type of personality… I just try to get in to the character, and knowing the basics that I do about these people, that they are intensely narcissistic and that their overriding emotion is anger… it's easy to get into this character and say, this is what is happening to me."

The prolific writer isn't interested in taking a break from writing even though booksellers have barely had time to finish stocking copies of Heartstopper on bookshelves.

Fielding is currently in the final editing stage of her next book called Charley's Web, which she anticipates will be released next April.

"Charley's Web is a suspense novel and is a story of a young journalist who gets a letter, one day from a convicted child killer, a young woman who is sitting on death row and she wants her to write her story. And in uncovering details about this young woman's life, basically who she really discovers is herself."

The odyssey of an enlightened Muslim woman

Infidel* by Ayaan Hirsi Ali, Simon & Schuster.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

In case you haven't heard, Ayaan Hirsi Ali is the new poster girl for the liberated Muslim woman.

Born in Somalia and raised in Saudi Arabia, Ethiopia and Kenya, she arrived in Holland in 1992 when she was 22. Within a few years, she was a Dutch citizen, parliamentarian and outspoken critic of Islam whose analysis earned her the undying enmity of some of her fellow Muslims.

Ali was also a filmmaker. She and Theo van Gogh made two documentaries, Submission, Part 1 and Submission, Part 2, about the plight of Muslim women. The films enraged Muslim radicals, and one of them, Muhammed Bouyeri, killed van Gogh in a brutal daylight attack and threatened Ali.

In Infidel, a bestseller in Europe and North America, she examines her journey from the deserts of Somalia to the urban landscapes of Europe and the United States, where she currently lives.

Describing her book as "a subjective record" of her personal memories, she dedicates it to her family, though her father, an anthropologist and a dissident Somali politician, disowned her.

Hailing from a family of strictly devout nomads, Ali was two years old when her father was arrested and dumped in a prison. When she was still a child, she was "purified" when her genitals were removed

Once in Saudi Arabia, she was enrolled in a religious school where anti-Semitism was rampant. Her teacher portrayed Jews as "physically monstrous" and claimed that they controlled the world and, for the sake of Islam, had to be destroyed.

In retrospect, she writes: "The kind of thinking I saw in Saudi Arabia, and among the Muslim Brotherhood in Kenya and Somalia is incompatible with human rights and liberal values. It preserves a feudal mindset based on tribal concepts of honour and shame. It rests on self-deception, hypocrisy and double standards."

Tellingly, she adds, "This mindset makes the transition to modernity very painful for all who practise Islam."

An iconoclast, Ali's first act of rebellion occurred when she flouted her father's wish to marry a Canadian Somali in an arranged marriage.

Looking back, she observes: "I might have [had] a decent life, but I would be dependent – always – on someone treating me well. I knew that another kind of life was possible… the kind of life I had always wanted, with a real education, a real job, a real marriage. I wanted to make my own decisions. I wanted to become a person, an individual, with a life of my own."

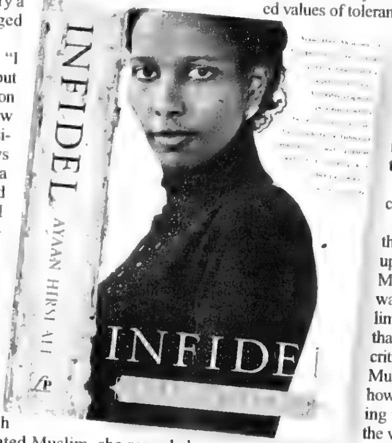
And so she fled to Amsterdam in a bid to reinvent herself. "After this," she writes, "anything was possible."

Holland changed her profoundly.

She shed her head scarf and discarded her long skirts as she immersed herself in secular Dutch society. But still being a dedicated Muslim, she regarded Holland as "an infidel country."

In 1995, she got her first job as a Somali-Dutch interpreter assisting Somali asylum seekers. Subsequently, she studied political science at Holland's oldest university, in Leiden, and graduated in 2000 with masters of science degree.

A refugee since childhood, Ali obtained Dutch citizenship so that she could travel and fit in more easily.



She claims that Holland's brand of multiculturalism was self-defeating. As she sees it, the Dutch government promoted Muslim separatism by funding Islamic schools and politely allowing Muslim immigrants "to live alone in their own world."

As a result, many Muslims never learned Dutch and rejected values of tolerance and personal liberty, she notes.

By that point, her view of Islam had crystallized.

"What was I trying to achieve? Three things: first, I wanted Holland to wake up and stop tolerating the oppression of Muslim women in its midst. Second, I wanted to spark a debate among Muslims about reforming aspects of Islam so that people could begin to question, and criticize, their own beliefs. Third, I wanted Muslim women to become aware of just how bad, and unacceptable, their suffering was. I wanted to help them develop the vocabulary of resistance."

In line with her philosophy, Ali urged the Labor party to stop funding Qur'an-based schools, saying that they dismissed the values of universal human rights.

She argued that societies in the "rigid grip of Islam" oppress women, lag behind in development, are poor and seethe with conflict, while others are wealthy and peaceful.

When Ali realized that she and the Labor party could not reconcile their diametrical views, she bolted to the more conservative Liberal party, which offered her a chance to run for a seat in parliament in an upcoming election.

The Liberals did not fare brilliantly, but Ali was elected as the first Somali in the Dutch legislature.

She was a firebrand.

At a Liberal conclave, she proposed that the party should come out in favour of closing down existing Muslim schools and refusing to finance new ones. Her colleagues were shocked by her audacity.

In parliament, she raised a motion that would require the police to register the number of Muslim "honour killings" committed in Holland each year. The minister of justice announced a pilot project to track such murders.

Ali's decision to join forces with Van Gogh in the films Submission was hardly surprising.

"My message was that the Qur'an is an act of man, not of God. We should be free to interpret it; we should be permitted to apply it to the modern era in a different way, instead of performing painful contortions to try to recreate the circumstances of a horrible distant past. My intention was to liberate Muslim minds so that Muslim women – and Muslim men, too – might be freer."

Submission was broadcast on Dutch TV without much reaction, but then van Gogh was murdered by a disaffected Moroccan extremist. The murder devastated Ali, but did not crush her.

What seemed to affect Ali more was the nullification of her Dutch citizenship, which was probably orchestrated by her enemies. When she applied for it, she foolishly used a false name and date of birth.

This blow to her pride has not diluted her ideas.

As she puts it in the closing pages of this courageous book, "My central, motivating concern is that women in Islam are oppressed. That oppression… causes Muslim women… and men… to lag behind the West. It creates a culture that generates more backwardness with every generation. It would be better for everyone – for Muslims, above all – if this situation could change."

Fighting words, these.

NHL players' union fires executive director

Ted Saskin

CJN Staff

The executive board of the National Hockey League Players' Association voted unanimously last week to fire its executive director, Ted Saskin.

The move, which was announced by the union in a short statement, came after a conference call of the board, made up of player representatives from the NHL's 30 teams, plus the union's six-member executive committee.

Saskin and senior NHLPA director Ken Kim had been on a forced paid leave since March following allegations he and Kim read players' e-mail as part of the ongoing turmoil in the union over his hiring.

As Goodenow's right-hand man, Saskin was credited with playing a major role in hammering out an agreement between the league and the union. But his hiring was controversial – some high-profile players were critical of the union for agreeing to a salary cap, and some alleged Saskin got the job without going through a proper hiring process and were unhappy with his pay, said to be the highest among player union heads in the four major North American professional sports leagues.

> 16 years with NHLPA included key role in negotiations to end lockout

He was two years into a five-year contract reportedly worth $10 million.

In its statement, the union said it would not comment further about Saskin, "as this is an internal matter."

In a brief e-mail to Canadian Press, Saskin said, "All I am going to say at this time is that I remain proud of all the work I did for NHL players over the last 16 years and particularly in negotiating the new CBA, which has been working out well. I will work towards a fair resolution of my contractual rights with the NHLPA and wish them well in the future."

Saskin, a Montreal native, lives in Toronto with his wife and four children. A former intellectual property rights lawyer with the Toronto firm Goodmans, he's a member of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation and has long been active in Jewish communal life.

The politics of tolerance

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Last month, I was invited by Canadian Friends of the Simon Wiesenthal Center to visit the worldwide headquarters of the Simon Wiesenthal Center in Beverly Hills, Calif. The centrepiece of the Los Angeles campus is the Museum of Tolerance, an engaging tool for educating people (especially young people) about the importance of, well, tolerance. The museum is truly a multimedia exhibition (there are TV and computer screens everywhere) – just the kind of design you need if your goal is to educate elementary and high school students. And the setup seems to be working: according to our tour guide, the museum hosts an average of 1,000 students each day.

Any exhibit bearing the name of Simon Wiesenthal must have a Holocaust aspect to it, and at the Museum of Tolerance, the displays about the murder of six million Jews are the final and most elaborate ones. The exhibit misses no detail in chronicling the Nazis' genocidal campaign against European Jewry, beginning as Germany comes to grips with defeat in World War I, continuing through the rise, fall and second coming of Hitler and culminating with a chilling death march through a mock gas chamber.

The Holocaust section and other museum exhibits dealing with racial politics, poverty and genocide send a clear message: we must be tolerant of one another, because when we are intolerant, we are inhumane.

But the Museum of Tolerance is not quite comprehensive. Among its omissions (and, admittedly, there are few) is any mention of the torturing of Iraqi prisoners by American troops at the Abu Ghraib prison. When one member of our group asked the tour guide why that example of intolerance was left out, she replied, rather unconvincingly, that museum exhibits are updated every few months, and that the Abu Ghraib incident – in 2004 – had simply occurred between updates. There are, after all, the politics of tolerance, too.

While in Los Angeles, I was reading journalist Christopher Hitchens' new book God Is Not Great: How Religion Poisons Everything. Hitchens is an interesting personality: a political leftist who nonetheless sides with neoconservatives on U.S. foreign policy (he continues to support the wars in Iraq and Afghanistan), he's also a devout atheist and a belligerent anti-theist.

One needs only to read the title of Hitchens' book to understand where he's headed. God Is Not Great alternates between the two basic arguments that there is no such thing as God (he's a man-made creation used by powerful people to inspire feelings of fear, vulnerability and inadequacy in the rest of us), and that religious people are destroying the world because of their intolerance. Organized religion, he argues, is the driving force behind everything bad in the world.

Hitchens' anti-religion manifesto glosses over the obvious fact that non-religious movements – take Nazi fascism, for example – have committed their fair share of atrocities over the course of history. Still, God Is Not Great does contain an undeniable truth: Intolerance is a rather popular policy in most religions. That is, powerful groups within each of the world's major religions unabashedly preach and practice intolerance towards anyone who isn't exactly like them – that is, non-believers, those who believe in another God and even people who follow the same God but in a different way. Religion has had a dark, intolerant side from day one.

You'd think that tolerance would come naturally to people – do unto others what you would have them do unto you seems so obvious – but it often doesn't turn out that way. That's probably because there are so many forces running interference against tolerance. One could convincingly argue that Hitchens' intolerance of religion bears a strong resemblance to the religious intolerance he decries. And, even at an essentially honourable institution like the Museum of Tolerance, the force of politics sometimes gets in the way.

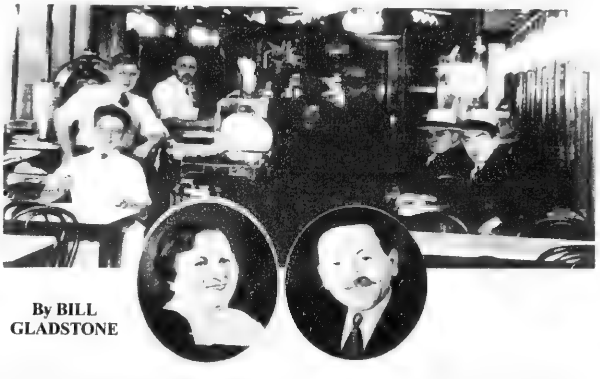
REMEMBERING OUR YESTERDAYS

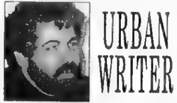


By BILL GLADSTONE

In 1921, Harry and Jenny Shopsowitz, former egg candlers from Kielce, opened a tiny ice cream parlour on Spadina Avenue near Dundas Street, in the heart of Toronto's garment district, that grew into the famous Shopsy's delicatessen. The deli is shown here in 1939, with Harry behind the cash register and son Israel (Iz) standing in front of him. Brothers Israel and Sam took over the hot dog and corned beef emporium from their parents and built it into a multi-million-dollar meat and catering business that they eventually sold. For decades a Spadina landmark, Shopsy's was situated between the Standard (Yiddish) Theatre (later renamed the Strand and Victory Burlesque) and Sammy Taft, the "Mad Hatter" of Spadina.

War: a Diaspora-Israel partnership

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG



I'm sitting on the porch of a friend's cottage, overlooking Georgian Bay. I'm chatting with an Israeli buddy. At one point during our talk, he looks at me very sternly, and says, "There is a smell of war in the air in Israel."

I ask him to explain, and he tells me that most Israelis are expecting a war this summer between Israel and Iran, Syria and Hezbollah. My Israeli comrade says the chances of things turning out otherwise are slight, as Israel must fight this war to show that it's strong, as well as to eradicate Iran's nuclear threat and the threat from Syria and its support of the very thorny and dangerous Hezbollah.

So what does a Jew do to prepare for war?

If you're an Israeli, you debate tactics and strategies over and over again in coffee shops all over the country. Arguments are plenty among Israelis about the potential outcome of such a war and whether their country has the will to really take the war to the enemy, as it did in 1967.

If you're an Israeli, you puff up your chest with courage and resolve, accepting the inevitability of bloodshed. Israelis are on the front line.

Israelis have a way of dealing with such eventualities by combining humour and disassociation with practical acceptance. I once listened to a conversation between two Israelis who brushed off a terror attack in which "only two people were killed." Clearly, the Israeli response to war and death is a deep-seated defence mechanism against pain and suffering.

What does a Diaspora Jew do to prepare for war? We are in a difficult predicament, knowing that the battle is not on our doorstep and that the world will hammer away at us for precipitating such an action, regardless of whether self-defence plays a role or not. On a deep, self-conscious level, we also fear reprisals and terror attacks on our own turf. Diaspora Jews are at base camp.

We experience tremendous outward fear as Syria masses on its front and Iranian madmen continue to hurl threats of destruction at the State of Israel. We do because unlike Israelis, we haven't built up the same resistance to cope with the realities of war.

This partly stems from the truth that it's scarier to be at a distance from the "action" then it is to be in the middle of it. Proof of this comes when a terror attack happens in Netanya or Kiryat Shmonah and for days on end, we mourn the deaths of those who perished and pray for those who were injured.

Israelis, as mentioned, instead face the situation, size it up, clean up "the mess" and move on (although the long-term mental and emotional state of Israelis is affected in ways that are very serious).

Israelis survey the political and military terrain and then hunker down to get the job done. Diaspora Jews, however, are, in part, bystanders, despite the fact we contribute to the war through funds, prayer and keeping a constant eye on day-to-day news. We are partial outsiders to our own history, feeling guilty in assuming that we're safe from the immediate harm of rockets dropping on our home or landing in our local schoolyard.

Yet, at the end of the day, as the smell of war becomes stronger, Israeli and Diaspora Jews join together, each aware of our individual responsibilities – Israelis to fight the war, and we to defend our homeland Israel everywhere and anywhere when required.

As war once again comes our way, we Jews know our job. It is to be one with each other and to contribute in any way that we're able. May God bless us with life and the strength to fight the war properly so that the State of Israel is forever.

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

About 20 volunteers from Temple Emanu-El, Kehillat Shaarei Torah, Beth Tikvah Synagogue, Temple Har Zion, Beit Rayim Synagogue and Shaar Shalom Synagogue joined forces on April 29 with Habitat for Humanity, an independent, charitable housing program that provides affordable housing to low income families.

Volunteers were on hand at 4200 Kingston Rd., south of Lawrence Avenue, to help with Phase 1 of a build that ran from 8:30 a.m. to 4:00 p.m., and will lead to the erection of 10 homes for families who can't afford traditional mortgages.

"People gave up a day to do this as well as donated and collected pledges. So it's not just your time, it's also money you're raising to participate," said project co-ordinator Gloria Shere.

The volunteers, who had to be at least 16 years old, were asked to raise at least $50 to participate. As a group, they managed to raise more than $1,100.

This is the third time that members from the synagogues on or near Bayview Avenue joined together to participate in a Habitat for Humanity build.

"It's a wonderful program, they provide homes for low-income families and I guess most of us who belong to these synagogues are homeowners and appreciate what it means to have your own home," Shere said.

Habitat for Humanity, which aims to give families in need a helping hand rather than a handout, requires that recipients go through a screening process with its family selection committee, which determines who is entitled to a home based on their need, their ability to pay the interest-free mortgage, and their willingness to give back to the community.

If a family is living in an overcrowded or run-down home, or their housing costs exceed 35 per cent of their gross income, they will be considered for a home.

The family must also be willing to put in the mandatory "sweat equity" – 500 hours of volunteer work – to help build their own houses and other Habitat houses as well.

With thousands of Habitat for Humanity affiliates all over the world and about 60 chapters in Canada alone, the organization has helped more than one million people since 1976.

"It was great. We shlepped, we hammered, we sawed, but it was a lot of fun. I think this was an activity that a lot of us don't participate in normally, and it was just a lot of fun," Shere said.

She added that it was very encouraging to see that many youths, despite the fact that some were too young to participate in this year's build, were interested in the project.

"There were a lot of young people, which was very nice, a few 25-year-olds. It was very nice to have them participating."

Shere said that there was one young volunteer who loved the program so much that he plans to volunteer all summer.

"Apparently, he was supposed to be a counsellor at camp, but the camp didn't get enough campers… so he decided that he wants to spend the months of July and August building as a result of his experience."

Cleaning service can help ready house for sale

While spring cleaning seems like a daunting task at first, it presents you with the opportunity to renew, recharge and transform your home from its drab winter state into a fresh environment ready for the summer.

And thanks to Cleanol (www.cleanol.com, 416-745-5221), that burden no longer has to be solely yours. Cleaning, restoration and renovation experts, Cleanol has been offering just about every cleaning solution in the greater Toronto area and throughout southern Ontario for more than 65 years.

With an extensive list of services, including carpet cleaning, "enviro-care" specialty cleaning, duct cleaning and 24-hour water and fire damage emergency repair, Cleanol isn't just an ordinary cleaning company. Quite the contrary – Cleanol operates out of a 35,000-square-foot plant, and houses North America's largest automated rug-cleaning system and state-of-the-art dry-cleaning system.

"We're proud of our company," says Jeffrey Friedman, vice-president of sales and marketing. "The majority of our personnel have been with us for over 20 years. We pride ourselves on our excellent customer service. Once we quote the price for a job, we stick to it. We always guarantee our work."

Cleanol helps clean up

One of Cleanol's newest services is Centre-Stage, which helps to "de-clutter" and revitalize your home so that it looks its best for potential buyers.The company can call in any help you may need. From consulting with interior decorators to bringing in extra lighting fixtures and art pieces and utilizing off-site storage facilities, Cleanol helps ensure that your home receives the amount it deserves when it is sold.

"Centre-Stage allows us to deliver many of the different cleaning services we have to help you increase the value of your home," says company chairman Ted Bzialowski.

Cleanol also offers a myriad of eco-friendly services that do no harm to the environment or the people in the vicinity of the cleaning products, including using a hardwood cleaner that utilizes a self-contained dustless system. Since the chemicals are not released into the air, they pose no breathing hazard.

Cleanol also offers services unique to the Jewish market. For example, as one doesn't generally plan to host shivah, the company can be called in on an emergency basis to help ready the house to welcome guests.

Cleanol can achieve a level of clean that is seldom achievable on your own. "For example, people rarely clean their air ducts, if ever," says Bzialowski. "You'd be horrified to know how damaging that is to the airflow of your home."

Friedman adds that "most people also aren't aware that simply vacuuming a carpet doesn't remove anything below the surface."

Is your place a mess? The Declutter Queen can help

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Corinne Kalles needed someone to help her organize some rooms in her home, she called in The Declutter Queen (416-521-9326).

"The Declutter Queen came to my home two summers ago and organized my home office, kitchen, laundry room and, most importantly, the dreaded storage area.

"She grouped all of my years of buying and receiving gifts and labelled everything for easier access."

Kalles, a sales rep for Harvey Kalles Real Estate, saw the benefits of using The Declutter Queen – alias Cindy Gorenkoff – when she moved to a new home.

"Last year, we sold our house," she wrote. "Because we had done quite a bit of organizing with Cindy, it was very easy to pack and move. Cindy worked diligently to achieve great results."

Client satisfaction and referrals have been key to the growth of The Declutter Queen, the company started by Gorenkoff two years ago.

Although the company is relatively new, Gorenkoff, who describes herself "as a meticulous and detailed person," spent more than 15 year honing her organizational and logistic skills as a fundraising supervisor for a staff of 24 and in her work co-ordinating meetings and hearings for the Ontario Council of University Affairs.

Cindy Gorenkoff

She chose her new career in organizing after watching Clean Sweep on TLC. "I was inspired by the host of the show. He took organizing from the perspective of the psychological meaning of decluttering. What does it mean to hang on to things? His attitude is: 'Let us help you make your life simpler.'"

She stresses that she helps people make their homes more livable. "People waste a lot of time looking for things because there is so much clutter in their homes.

"My mission is to help busy women and families organize their things so they can use their time for more important things."

To that end, The Declutter Queen helps people simplify their lives by sorting through and getting rid of things. "I help people figure out what they can give away."

The services offered by The Declutter Queen include packing up homes for staging before a home goes on the market, home staging, packing people for moving, general decluttering, and content and estate sales.

Helping people part with items they don't need can be a challenge, says Gorenkoff. "You have to make them feel good about what they are giving away."

She says she's in touch with charities that pick up furniture and companies that dispose of garbage.

One of the reasons clutter builds up is because people hold on to things they don't need, she explains. "People redecorate their homes. They get new linens and drapery and they hold on to the old stuff.

"The main challenge is helping them let go of things they feel there'll be some use for in the future."

She says there is usually one room in a house that becomes the catch-all place for junk. "If someone gets a new TV, they take the old TV and throw it in that room. My suggestion is to take a lot of the things you no longer need and pack them up."

For instance, she suggests pre-packing things such as extra linen and dishes for later use when children go way to university or move out and items designated for the cottage should be moved there as soon as possible to free up space.

To reduce excess junk in a house, The Declutter Queen advises people to "reduce, reuse and recycle as much as possible."

She says the best way of organizing people is to help them find a space for things. "Everything has to have a home. It's easy to put the item away if it has a home."

Cottage resort offers escape from city life

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With picturesque lakefront views, a bounty of nature trails and amenity-filled residences, cottage resorts are a hot commodity.

People of all ages are fleeing the hustle and bustle of big city life for more tranquil settings, replete with all the creature comforts they cherish.

"People want to go on vacation to a place that they can call their own," says Bill Van Gelder, the founder and developer of Blue Water Acres, a cottage resort near Huntsville, Ont.

Nestled on the Lake of Bays in the Muskoka region, Blue Water Acres is home to almost 40 detached cottages, with a variety of resort services available, including tennis courts, indoor swimming, a children's playground, kayaks and canoes, as well as extensive recreational trails.

Van Gelder emphasizes that when people are looking for a cottage resort, location is key.

"The number one thing is location," he says.

"For instance, cottage buyers often want a natural sandy beach, privacy and lakefront access. We have all of that here."

Van Gelder adds that the cottage's proximity to nature trails, restaurants and the length of time it takes you to drive there are important location-related factors to consider.

Whether you buy or rent a cottage, the resort setup is appealing to many people because it offers the convenience of someone else looking after property maintenance and management.

"Good service and property management is something people really care about," says Van Gelder, noting Blue Water Acres is family-owned and managed.

"One thing guests really love in our case is that our family runs it, and we ensure the guests have all the amenities and services they require."

To that end, your quest to find the right cottage resort should involve thorough research into whether the resort offers the type of vacation you want.

For instance, if you want a "sit back and let someone else do everything for you" kind of vacation, then seek out a cottage resort that offers things such as meal plans and constant programming for kids.

Cottage living is increasingly going hand-in-hand with golfing, so if you're a club swinger, be sure your cottage is not too far from some striking greens.

"There's at least 15 good courses, ranging from family friendly to some of the top-ranked courses in the country."

As with any major consumer purchase, read the fine print before signing on the dotted line to rent or own a cottage. There are many legal documents with a large number of financial details, and you'll want to ensure you're getting exactly what you pay for.

Speaking of price, cottage resorts of varying qualities are available, so be sure to get the best bang for your buck.

Blue Water Acres' cottages will be on the market this month.

Before reno

Too many cooks spoil the kitchen reno

By ELLA BURAKOWSKI
Special to The CJN

It all started with a surprise party I made for my husband. He was so impressed that he thought he would reciprocate by getting me a dream gift – a brand new kitchen.

Sounds great, right? In theory, it's wonderful, but living through it was a whole other story.

Of course, we wanted the best finishes, appliances, gadgets, cabinetry and flooring – and all at economical prices. That meant something had to give. We started talking in July 2006, ended up ordering the cabinetry in December that year, and finally had a finished product 10 months after the project began.

Marshall, my husband, thought we could use our friend Rob to do all the preliminary work – demolish the old kitchen, replace electrical and plumbing fixures, etc. – and save a bundle. And Marshall would be Rob's apprentice.

Naturally, Rob was only available from January to April, and only on weekends. Also, Rob happens to live about 3½ hours away from us.

We thought it was a good idea to keep the whole thing in the family. Marshall's brother Eric works for a kitchen company, so we placed our order through him.

As there were literally too many cooks in the kitchen, the disagreements reached dangerously high levels, because everyone had an opinion on just about every aspect of the work. The decisions that need to be made during a kitchen renovation are numerous, and, lucky me, I am blessed with a husband who has an opinion on everything, including colours, styles, finishes, appliances, sink, taps and anything else that might come up. We even disagreed on the colour of the electrical sockets.

Then there was the question of how to empty the existing kitchen. Where are you supposed to keep everything inside all the kitchen cupboards, for months and months? In the living and dining room, of course. The refrigerator found a new home in our dining room as well.

As the stove was removed early in the renovation, pizza became the perfect food, since it required no dishes or utensils, just a couple of paper towels.

If I ever see another slice of pizza, I just may hurl. And dining out, which used to be a treat, became an aggravation.

I was actually managing until I lost the use of my sink. It's amazing how much you rely on a kitchen sink. The powder room took on a dual purpose and was used as both a bathroom and a kitchen.

Finally, the day arrived when they stopped ripping things out of the kitchen and started building it back up. First came the floor. We chose hardwood, against the advice of every hardwood dealer. Apparently hardwood is too delicate to use in a kitchen. But we figured everyone else was doing it, so we would do it, too.

After ten months and lots of pizza- a dream kitchen

Then came the cupboards – a few at a time. The company could not deliver all the cupboards at once because I had nowhere to keep them until they were all installed.

So where did we store them? You guessed it – in the living and dining room. We called it "the staging area," right on top of my Oriental rugs. The furniture in the living room was removed to make room for the kitchen.

Each cupboard took forever to install, as the walls, ceiling and floor were not level. But exactly six weeks after we started putting them in, the kitchen cupboards were finally installed and all the excess wood was removed from the living room.

Once the bottom set of cabinets was in place, the granite company came in to measure for the counter. Another three-week wait for a counter, which again meant no sink.

Then the appliances arrived, and a whole new learning curve began. You need a technology degree to figure out our new range. Nothing like my old turn-it-on-and-off stove, this one has features that even Martha Stewart wouldn't use.

Now we had to put everything back. It didn't fit the way it used to, and we had to rethink the entire kitchen. As the cupboards and drawers were filled, the living room and dining room slowly reverted back to their original condition, and the dust stopped accumulating in every nook and cranny.

Now, 10 months later, 25 per cent over budget and 10 pounds heavier, we are all still speaking to each other, and I finally have my dream kitchen.

I love it!

Furnish the outdoors in contemporary style

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

Your backyard is "an additional living room – it has to reflect the value of your home," says Dave Reburn of Deck & Dock (416-781-4887, www.deckanddock.ca).

But if you think you're stuck with off-the-shelf dining suites and chaises, think again.

"There are as many options for the outdoors as there are in the indoors," Reburn says.

Outdoor furniture is more exciting than ever, he adds. New long-lasting surfaces, look-alike synthetics that look just like natural materials, and a wider range of high-end choices make this a great time to shop and buy, whether it's for one piece or a complete set.

That includes upholstery choices, a pleasant surprise if you're used to the limited selection in hardware or mass-market stores. "In some cases here, we might have over a thousand different fabrics to choose from."

Although the retail customer is the biggest part of his business, many designers approach Deck & Dock for middle- to high-end quality products for their clients, which have included some of the top hotels and golf courses across Canada.

"We deliver anywhere – we've shipped to Florida and the Caribbean," says Reburn. He's even shipped to Africa, after the wife of former Kenyan prime minister Jomo Kenyatta shopped in person at the store's location in the heart of the Design District, at 1280 Castlefield Ave., near Caledonia Road and Eglinton Avenue, ordering some 65 pieces to be shipped to her Mombasa coastal home.

Throughout the season, Deck & Dock delivers twice weekly to cottage country. They also take care of setup, meaning you'll get your furniture right away, not a bunch of boxes to open and loose pieces to assemble.

"The evolution of outdoor product has been quite dramatic." That's thanks to a shift in attitude of the general public. "It was a change of lifestyle… the outdoors became more important."

Today's outdoor furniture is as likely to be made of durable resin as anything that ever came from a tree, but you might not even be able to tell the difference at first.

> Take your livingroom outdoors

"People look at the arm of a chair and ask, 'What kind of wood is it?'" Yet it's just as likely to be resin, finished in a mahogany pattern and shade.

Many customers come in asking, "Can it stay outside?" Increasingly, the answer is yes, in almost any weather. Until recently, the only durable all-weather materials were cast metal and tempered glass. These days, updated materials and finishes are sturdy enough to withstand the elements, but beautiful enough to want to show off.

Keeping real wicker outdoors is a risky proposition, with peeling, fading and warping a hazard if the furniture is unattended in bright sun or heavy rains. The newest wicker-look vinyl keeps its shape and colour. Built over a sturdy aluminum frame, "the material is not going to deteriorate in any way," says Reburn.

One of the biggest differences in purchasing high-quality outdoor furniture is warranty – high-end manufacturers stand behind their products. Many of Deck & Dock's pieces carry a five- or 10-year warranty, but Reburn says the pieces will probably outlast even that.

"You'll be tired of it before you have to throw it away."

He also specializes in exclusive pieces you won't find elsewhere – like the newest cantilevered and remote-control umbrellas to provide shade and convenience. With a cantilever, you get all the shade of a traditional umbrella, often in a much larger size, but the "pole" of the umbrella is off to the side so it doesn't interfere with conversation or mobility.

Adjustable-length dining tables are another important item, and there have been other big changes recently in outdoor tables, Reburn says.

Standard tables are just not long enough for outdoor entertaining. "People have gone from 48" and 72" perhaps now to 100 [inches]."

While a 72-inch table seats six, many people are realizing their family alone needs that much space. For adding guests and greater comfort, they're looking for ways to seat eight, 10 or even 12 at a single table.

The table itself is increasingly becoming a focal point, Reburn says, as more options become available, such as different tabletop finishes.

"It used to be the table was glass and the chair was the big concern. You'd sit in it – that's comfortable, that's a lovely looking chair… and you'd arbitrarily take the table."

Today's outdoor table can be a dramatic statement in itself, not just an accessory to a beautiful chair, with finishes ranging from traditional tempered glass to teak, cast aluminum or even an all-weather mosaic.

Showcasing high-quality manufacturers such as Brown Jordan, Gloster, Lloyd Flanders, Summer Classics and others in its airy, 8,000-square-foot store, Deck & Dock is an eye-opening experience.

"It's a unique shopping environment," says Reburn, noting the presence of trees, bridges and even skylights that let in natural light for fabric and colour selection.

Deck & Dock's five full-time staff bring an accumulation of many years' knowledge and experience to help customers select furniture that truly reflects their lifestyle. You can choose pieces – entire suites or a few items at a time – that will proudly accentuate one of the most important "rooms" of your home.

Furniture choices to create dream spaces

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Mickey Zworth has been in the business since 1949, starting as a humble sweeper at Laskin's Furniture in Thunder Bay, owned by (former Supreme Court justice) Bora Laskin's father and brother.

His gift with words – he speaks eight languages – earned him rapid advancement. His boss eventually took the sweeper right out of his hands, saying, "I'll sweep the floor – you talk to the customers."

Almost 60 years later, Zworth is still talking to the customers, for the last six of those years from his own 20,000- square-foot location at 7855 Keele St., near Keele and Highway 7, where he has not one but two stores under one roof: 18th Century Furniture Galleries (905-760-1518) and the more humbly named The Furniture Dump (905-761-6077).

Mickey Zworth

"The Furniture Dump was named by my suppliers, manufacturers who said, 'We have so many samples, we want to get rid of them – we want to dump them out to you.'" While both stores feature name-brand products from quality manufacturers, The Furniture Dump is the place to go for new designers, samples and discontinued items at "give-away prices."

"I buy them at a ridiculously low price," says Zworth, "and kick them out at a ridiculous low price." While new stock comes in all week long, on Saturday and Sunday, "there's a lineup outside for people to get in."

On the other side of the store, in 18th Century, customers can find unique pieces by Stanley, American Drew, Lea Industries, Jessica McClintock, Bob Mackie, Michael Amini Designs and others.

"For customers who say, 'I like this product, I like this style, but I don't like the colours,'" the store's three interior designers – including Zworth's wife, Judy, and daughter-in-law, Ellen, can customize upholstery. They'll even go into customers' homes to help plan a complete living space.

Why does he still love furniture, even after 60 years? "It's in my blood! I don't know anything else… I don't like anything else except furniture." Helping customers is "a very, very big challenge… and we meet the challenge head-on."

From "traditional to transitional," there's something in one store or the other for every taste, from dining rooms to spare bedrooms, from established homes to student furniture.

"Just come and browse… the coffee is always on. People browse in both areas." Both 18th Century and Furniture Dump offer six-month no-interest credit, as well as full delivery and setup. "Customers always phone to say, 'You have such courteous drivers.' The service is just beautiful… they take their shoes off…bring empty cardboard cartons back with us."

Lane Home Furnishings (905-907-3473) may be a relative newcomer to the Toronto furniture scene, but they've been around in the United States for a hundred years, building their reputation on quality cedar chests and recliners. Of the store's four-year-old Vaughan Mills location, co-owner Clive Hall says, "There's a big wow factor… it's a bit of a fantasy."

The 20,000-square-foot store offers more than a single furniture-buying experience, with complete rooms outfitted in several carefully planned brands and themes.

The National Geographic collection offers "the type of furniture you'd expect to see from exotic places around the world." Walking through an archway, visitors pass through the National Geographic bedroom, dining room, living room, enjoying rich wood tones and vibrant fabric motifs that reflect "the creativity and traditions of the world's cultures"

Other brand collections are Eddie Bauer – "mature, rustic; kind of like a cottage or lodge getaway" – and Country Living, "the type of furniture you'd find in a French country home." These brands are exclusive to Lane, Hall says, and are updated with new pieces every three months, so there's always something fresh in store.

"Everything in our store is for sale," says Hall. "The carpet, pictures… you can go in and buy a room, and have it delivered and set up exactly as you see it on the floor." While some shoppers do just that, others prefer to purchase one or two items at a time – looking forward to a return trip to buy a few more items.

"What Lane offers is affordable luxury," says Hall. That's reflected in yet another area of the store, Veronica's Interiors, where his partner, co-owner Rick Duggan, brings his experience as a furniture builder to offer custom pieces tailored to perfectly co-ordinate with the store's collections.

Customers often mix and match – pairing Lane pieces with custom pieces tailored to their tastes. "If they don't love the colour of the table, but they love the style, they can custom build it… We can design anything they'd like if they can't find it in the Lane collection."

Although the store itself is new on the scene, Hall says staff members such as Rachelle Frankel, formerly of Frankel's Fine Furniture on Doncaster, are all experts. "Everybody has over 15 years experience… they come from some of the top furniture names."

With five Canadian locations (there are 60 in the United States) and plans to expand across the country, Lane has also recently acquired a Canadian warehouse and service department, with all staff trained directly by Lane at its Tupelo, Miss., headquarters.

From exclusive collections to custom furniture and even space design and colour consultation, Hall says Lane is all about pricing and quality, but also about making fantasies come true. "We want to help them create a dream space."

Boutique-style condo offers a neighbourhood feel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In an era of towering structures filled with tiny suites and legions of tenants, it's getting harder to find affordable condominiums that are spacious and neighbourly.

But that is precisely what Alvear Palace aims to do.

Located near Bathurst Street and Steeles Avenue in Thornhill, the boutique-style building rises a modest eight storeys, with 40-plus units ranging in size from 1,000 to 2,800 square feet.

"If you go to these new condominiums, they are 20 to 25 floors and the tenants don't know each other," says the sales manager.

"Because we have 44 units, it's very cozy and there's a sense of being part of a neighbourhood."

Coziness inside the suites themselves is something condo enthusiasts of all stripes generally seek out.

Such features as custom kitchen cabinetry and wood flooring in the living and dining areas are alluring features to buyers and renters.

"People also want top-of-the-line appliances and high ceilings," says the sales manager, adding that suites in Alvear Palace come with a balcony or terrace for scenic views and the windows are stylishly tinted.

Some important points to consider in your condo hunt is how the building is monitored and the often painful issue of parking.

For instance, you may want patrol staff keeping a watchful eye on the premises and a concierge either at a welcome gate or the front door.

As for parking, you'll need to ensure that not only do you have a parking space that you either own or rent, but also that when friends and family come to visit, they have a place to park close by.

Amenities in condos can be quite alluring. Many people like luxuries such as tennis courts and swimming pools, but they must bear in mind that these accoutrements often come at a steep price.

"Sometimes, many amenities means higher maintenance fees," says the sales manager. "We try to go with amenities for the mainstream."

To that end, the sales manager says Alvear Palace has a number of convenient accessories, such as an exercise room and multipurpose lounge/party room with a kitchen, bar and dance floor.

But the building hasn't gone over the top with pricey extra features, which helps keep maintenance fees reasonable.

Customize your vacation home at Sophie's Landing in Orillia

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The Sophie's Landing housing development north of Toronto is focusing on customization to offer unique homes, said Eric Kerzner, president of the Signature Carleton building firm.

"With no two homes alike, we are creating a French Village setting, not a subdivision," Kerzner said.

Sophie's Landing is located in Orillia on the north shore of Lake Simcoe. The development is being billed as a "four-season resort community" that pairs the amenities of the city with "country charm."

The sold-out Phase I of the project included 49 homes. Phase II went on sale in mid-April and 40 per cent of the 36 custom bungalows are already sold, said project manager Craig Crane.

Homes vary in size from about 1,000 to 3,000 square feet. They feature full basements, optional lofts, open kitchens and attached garages. On-site amenities in the gated community include nature trails, a pool, clubhouse, spa and a private marina.

The development also has a customization program that allows purchasers to tailor their homes to suit their needs.

Crane said customization options are numerous and include anything from changes to the basement, loft and design of the interior to the colours and shingles on the exterior.

"Purchasers have added 300, 400 and 500 square feet to a loft, and built decks that overlook the water," Crane said.

The most attractive element of Sophie's Landing is the atmosphere of the neighbourhood, said Crane, which he described as "close-knit, friendly and pedestrian."

"It is near the water and there are lots of amenities," he said. Outside of what the development offers, downtown Orillia is a five-minute drive away, and skiing, golfing and Casino Rama are also nearby.

For more information about Phase II of the Sophie's Landing development, visit www.sophieslanding.ca or call 705-329-7710.

Electronic and security expertise available for the homeower

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Whether you need help installing your new home security system with its complicated wiring or you want someone to do other electronic work, you may need an electronics expert to save you.

INTO Electronics (http://www.into-electronics.com, 416-445-8274) offers security system installation and monitoring at the most sophisticated level. Simultaneously serving the commercial and residential markets, INTO Electronics offers 24/7 system management, including building and property management and off-site security watch services.

The company was launched in 1990, when founder Rod Wechsler wanted to "give clients a very service-oriented approach to security."

The company, which is based in Toronto, has expanded to the point where it now offers its services to some of the largest corporations across North America. It is also responsible for securing some of Toronto's major Jewish buildings, including the Holy Blossom Temple and Bialik Hebrew Day School.

INTO Electronics offers 24/7 remote assistance as well as a fully computerized response centre waiting to help its clients.

A major feature of Into Electronics' large-scale projects is that doors can be monitored remotely and locked at any moment if necessary. Moreover, as many as 120 security cameras can be installed in a single building or area. Though this tends to be a manifestation of a larger security system, any of INTO Electronics' services can be adapted for your home.

"Even some corner stores utilize Into Electronics systems," Wechsler says.

The Into Electronics experts are highly trained and solution driven. Aiming to remove the stress from the busy schedules of property managers and homeowners alike, the company offers a superior approach to security.

For another option in home security and electrician services, try SB Electric (416-834-4312). Established eight years ago, the company will repair any electronic problem, from re-wiring to installing light fixtures, and has recently expanded into the area of security system cameras, selling wireless security cameras for both home and business use.

The cameras can be installed directly onto existing motion detectors. While requiring very little installation labour and maintenance, the wireless cameras offer superb quality with a reach of up 30 metres from the eye of a single camera. SB provides software, and the footage from the camera is easily recorded onto a VCR, computer or other devices.

Working in both the commercial and the residential markets, SB electric brings professionalism to every project.

"The quality of my work is superb, yet I am always fair in my pricing," says SB founder Serge Roytman. Known for his overriding honesty and excellent work ethic, Roytman has developed a strong and growing clientele in the city.

"We have so many customers that have been with us for years because they trust the way we work," he says.

Operating on an appointment basis, Roytman will assess an individual project and quote his price for free. While a more design- or renovation-based project may take longer to complete, Roytman can attend to emergency situations as soon as they happen. "If it's a serious problem, I try to get to it is as soon as I can," he says. "Overall, clients appreciate our efficient and honest work."

Whether your security project is large or small, business or home-based, Into Electronics and SB Electric are both on the cutting edge of the newest technologies. Make sure you do everything possible to protect your property from unwanted intruders – ask for help from the experts.

Creating a cohesive look for your home

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Decorating your home seems like fun, right? Matching your couch to your carpet is all fun and games – but try matching that couch with the rest of your house and you've got quite the daunting task ahead of you. There's a big difference between simply decorating a room and creating a cohesive look for your home.

That's where Laura M. Stein Interiors (www.lauramstein.com, 416-659-2504) comes in. A maven in everything from interior décor and styling to graphic design, Stein has been in the design industry in one form or another over the course of her entire career. Homing in on her love for interior décor, Stein launched her company last summer and has been working with clients across the city to create completely personalized living spaces ever since. A natural multi-tasker, this one-woman-show offers a variety of home décor services as well as staging, which is the process of beautifying your home for selling.

"I always strive to create something new – engaging, inviting, esthetically beautiful, yet easily functional spaces that reflect a unique lifestyle and personality," she says.

Since every customer is different, Stein forms her design ideas around the needs and desires of the client. "So often, my clients tell me that the last designer they worked with shot down every idea they had," says Stein. "It's extremely important to me to make my clients' ideas work because at the end of the day, it's their home and they have to love it."

Working by appointment, Stein first meets with her clients to get a feel for their lifestyle and needs for the specific project. "People know what they want – they just don't know how to put it together," says Stein. Once a general concept is decided on, Stein develops a detailed budget as well as a few different plans for the clients to choose from. "It's really an organic design process," she says.

While preferring a clean and bright esthetic, Stein works completely from the ideas of the client, mixing in small elements of colour, texture and trend. "Trends present a nice guideline to pull ideas from, but they should always be used sparingly," says Stein. "Just like your wardrobe, if a room is too trendy you will hate it by next season."

Stein cites bright citruses such as orange and lime as well as fuchsia and turquoise as hot colours for spring, but again to be used sparingly! "Bright colours really pop on accent pieces such as a couch, a single wall or when paired with a more classic black and white motif," she says.

Design trends should be used sparingly

Patterns, layering and reflective surfaces as well as a modern take on shabby chic are other major trends for the year.

"Overall, we are seeing a much more casual approach to living," Stein says. Reflecting this more modern approach to home décor, she strives to combine beautiful design with functionality. "I rarely see those 'non-touch' rooms anymore, that's a thing of the past", says Stein.

Whether you have young children, enjoy entertaining or combine your living with a working space, Stein's philosophy is that your home should reflect what you use it for.

What to look for in a good barbecue

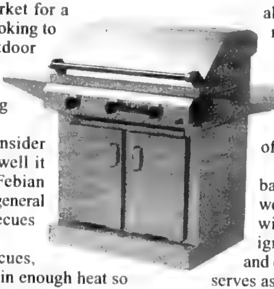
By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With the hot days of summer on the horizon, barbecue season is here.



So if you're in the market for a brand new barbecue or looking to spruce up your older outdoor cooking machine, always remember that its heating capabilities count in a big way.

"The first thing to consider with a barbecue is how well it retains heat," explains Febian Frempong, president and general manager of Sobie's Barbecues Ltd. in North York.

"With high-end barbecues, you should be able to retain enough heat so that you can even barbecue when it's as low as – 40 degrees."

Sobie's specializes in high-end barbecues, including gas and propane, built-in, portable and charcoal models.

The company also offers full servicing to fix and maintain barbecues.

Another key component of a barbecue's heating prowess is the number of burners it has.

Frempong notes four burners is the popular amount these days, particularly because it allows people to cook a full meal in a variety of ways.

"Four burners is most common largely because it lets people do indirect cooking like a convection oven," he offers.

"For example, if you're barbecuing chicken, you would put it on two burners with the fire off, and then ignite the other two burners and close the hood. That way, it serves as a convection oven, allowing the meat to cook slowly and retain all of its juices."

In addition to the burners, a barbecue's briquettes or bars and its cooking grills are also important.

With respect to the briquettes, better quality ones are made of durable ceramic that can withstand intense heat and dripping. Good bars are made of stainless steel.

Frempong warns that with porcelain coated bars, "within a year or two, they may start to crack and rot, so you'll have to replace them."

While all these ingredients combine to cook the tastiest meal, keeping your barbecue in good condition will ensure you can enjoy those delicious meals for a long time.

"Every time you use the barbecue, you must make it a point to clean the bars and also the inside of the hood, because it collects carbon," Frempong says.

"With the cooking grill, I always advise people to turn the barbecue on high and close the hood for about 15 to 20 minutes to burn off whatever is left on the hood. And while it's still hot, use your brush to clean the rest off."

Frempong adds that with a cast iron grill, spreading vegetable oil on it before and after cooking is a good way to keep it clean and season the food.

A smart way of knowing how confident a manufacturer is in its product is by its warranty.

If the warranty for the burners is only a year, then the barbecue may not be worth your time.

Sobie's advises that burner warranties should be at least five years and the warranty for the body should be at least 10 years.

Now that you have all that information, it's time to fire up your burners!

To find out more about Sobie's, visit www.sobies.com or call 416-224-2526.

Specialty shops feature kids' furnishings

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Whether it be your first-born or number 2, 3, 4 or 5 – adding that new bundle of joy into your life is just about as good as it gets. Adding that bundle to your home, however, can prove to be considerably less easy. From sourcing the best price for a high chair to getting the cutest pillows for the crib, visiting a specialty baby-children's shop is your best bet.

With the perfect blend of personal touch and large-scale selection, Dear-Born Baby (www.dearbornbaby.com, 905-881-3334) offers any and everything for babies from cribs to dressers and linens to car seats.

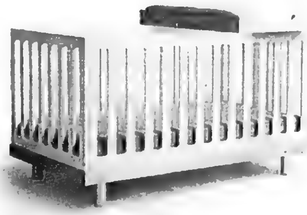
The Thornhill store was founded by Cathy Scott 28 years ago and has been serving moms and tots (newborn to age two) ever since. Boasting a 25-person staff as well as an on-site professional photography studio, the store caters to every facet of a baby's life.

"We can start as far in advance as six months before the baby's birth to order everything that the parents may want," says Scott.

Dear-Born features one of the largest in-store inventories of baby products in the city, and customized products can be ordered. Offering layaway services as well as baby registries, the store will make sure that the perfect room awaits the newborn.

Picking and choosing at international trade shows, Scott carries only the highest of quality products. Dear-Born is the largest dealer of Peg Pérego, the trusted Italian brand of strollers, high chairs and other accessories.

"I must have every stroller known to man," Scott says, laughing.



Among her favourite stroller products are the Mutsy and Stokke lines from Holland and Norway respectively. "Strollers are becoming very high-tech," says Scott. "The European strollers in particular are so unique and edgy looking. Nowadays people are getting more adventurous."

She cites the organic trend as having a huge impact on the baby industry. Carrying babies in sling carriers has become increasingly commonplace, as well as making baby food at home. "Eco-friendly furniture is just starting to appear as well," says Scott.

Dear-Born is almost set to launch its online boutique, where customers will be able to set up baby registries as well as purchase directly. "Today's clients have friends all over the world who want to take part in the baby's life," says Scott.

If furniture for children of all ages is what you are looking for, look no further than Kiddiesworld of Furniture (www.kiddiesworld.ca, 905-624-9092). Carrying furniture from "tot to teen," the 13,000-square-foot showroom is located in Mississauga. A family-owned business, Jerry White and son Shawn work together to "give you the professional knowledge and personalized service you need when making your very important selections."

"We carry all the furniture to outfit a nursery, but we don't leave it there," says Jerry White. Kiddiesworld carries up to queen-sized beds for teenagers. As well, many of the nursery pieces are fully adaptable for a child and into teenage years.

Featuring all the most trusted names in furniture and accessories such as Bugaboo, Natart and Pali, Kiddiesworld carries the brand-new line of Rockstar strollers. Created by members of Bon Jovi, the stroller is among the hottest items on the market. "The Rockstar stroller is very unique, and that is what we always strive for," says White. Another unique piece offered by Kiddiesworld is a Natart bedroom set that is designed to look like a house, complete with a roof, mirror, chalk board and hangers.

The extensive and unique inventory at Kiddiesworld is matched only by the knowledgeable and friendly staff. "We are into our second generation of customers because of how much the original customers enjoyed their experience with us," says White. "Our best advertiser is word of mouth."

Whether preparing for a new child or adjusting to that child's growth, a trip to either Dear-Born or Kiddiesworld will help simplify the process.

We Caught The Vision

As a personal friend as well as the builder of our Toronto home, Eric presented us with an idea he had for this interesting French Village inspired community in a very hot location in Orillia. We weren't really looking for a summer place at the time and may have considered the Muskokas' had we been thinking about it, but it all sounded so good we jumped in, so to speak. Our kids are young and active, with lots going on at home so if we have to go into the city it's just an hours drive and we can shoot right back after if we want to. We're definitely what you'd call 'city-folks', but now that we've got this amazing customized home with our backyard on Lake Simcoe, we really appreciate quality family time together and are feeling more like locals all the time. It's fantastic!

A really nice group of people live here and it shows by how friendly they are. We've even had our driveway shoveled by some of our neighbours when we were away! As a family we are enjoying many activities we never really did before, like fishing and swimming off our docks, hiking, roller-blading and curling . . . we love the freedom and outdoor lifestyle and are extremely happy with our decision to purchase here at Sophie's Landing.

Flooring experts help you update your home

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Whether you are looking to update part of your home or planning a large-scale renovation, a new look always includes a new floor. And since deciding which trends and techniques best suit your project can prove to be difficult, consulting a professional will help you make the right decision for your home.

Since 1949, Selyan's Oriental Rugs Ltd. has been catering to all your flooring needs. But don't be fooled by the name! Selyan's offers everything from area and Oriental rugs to hardwood and laminate. With two locations in Toronto at 1783 Avenue Rd. (416-781-2030) and 112 Oakdale Rd. (416-741-5990), Selyan's is a "store where shopping for flooring can be a relaxing and enjoyable experience."

In addition to carrying the top names in carpets and flooring, Selyan's imports Oriental rugs from as far away as Turkey, Pakistan, India and Iran. To ensure that you are confident in your purchase, the company offers free estimates, insurance and appraisals, as well as cleaning and repair services.

And satisfied customers keep coming back. "We have served generations of families because we've been in the business for so long," says co-owner Annie Selyan.

Riviera Flooring, at 8111 Jane St. Unit #6 in Concord (905-738-4588), is another excellent place to look for flooring options. Offering the best quality and selection in flooring at "down and dirty prices" for over 25 years, the combination showroom and warehouse acts as a one-stop-shop for hardwood, laminate and carpeting.

And to personalized the experience, owner Joe Rivietz meets with all his customers, making sure to share his expert and honest advice on their flooring choices.

As well as offering superior quality flooring, Riviera has full installation services. The highly professional installers come with over 50 combined years of carpet and hardwood servicing.

"We'll lift and dispose of existing floors and fully install the new one," Rivietz says. Furthermore, all service is bonded and guaranteed.

As well as showcasing a huge selection of flooring options, Riviera's installers can also re-stain your existing hardwood. And if re-staining your existing flooring is not for you, Riviera offers click-hardwood, which consists of pieces of real wood that snap together like laminate. Good for covering small areas, click-hardwood offers a beautifully finished and affordable choice for your floor.

Amcan Hardwood Floors (www.amcanhardwood.com, 416-784-0064) is another excellent, specialized source of flooring in the city. Located at 1120 Caledonia Rd., Amcan boasts more than 40 years of hardwood and installation expertise.

Working with more than 200 hardwood samples, the Amcan staff help customers choose the wood that best suits their design idea in a straightforward, honest fashion. The comfortable atmosphere will also put you at ease and help you focus on the choices at hand.

"We can match any piece of furniture," says Lina, an Amcan representative. When working with different shades of hardwood, Lina suggests mixing a combination of light and dark woods to brighten the effect.

"Dark wood is huge for the kitchen right now, but when it's mixed with a lighter wood, it looks much fresher," she says.

"Hardwood floor gives your house character and reveals both the spirit and creativity of those who live there. A symbol of warmth and welcome, a hardwood floor brings a room to life, creating an inviting, tranquil atmosphere for any room, on any occasion," the Amcan website says.

If your floors are in need of an update, look no further than Selyan's Oriental Rugs Ltd., Riviera Flooring and Amcan Hardwood Floors. Offering superb quality flooring at affordable prices, the three showrooms provide an accessible, extensive selection and will ensure that you make the best decision for sprucing up your home.

Custom interior trends: kitchen and beyond

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

From his 40 years' experience creating custom furniture, Sal DiMeglio of Regency Interiors 2000 Inc. (416-661-9100, www.regencyinteriors.ca) sees many exciting new trends for 2007. And whether it's in the home office, kitchen or bathroom, and even smaller jobs like walk-in closets, DiMeglio sees every job as a privilege: "I feel very proud and honoured."

It's an incredible responsibility, he says, transforming clients' concepts into high-quality, lasting designs. "Most of them have done their homework," he says of today's customers. "They've done research, they're much more aware."

The home office is becoming, in many ways, more home than office. "The home office has become a working environment and an entertainment environment," in the last 20 years, he says. Instead of being all business, today's home office must be "comfortable enough to do work," but also "nice enough for them to entertain friends," with TV, music, and comfortable seating.

DiMeglio also sees kitchens becoming a real social setting – "an area where you can have a cup of coffee; you don't have to go into the living room or family room," he says. Most new kitchens also feature televisions. But even more than in the past, they're all about food preparation. "Cooking has become much more important socially."

Some new considerations are practical, "like that double-bin recycle container in order for them to recycle and look after the environment… without having to go out to the recycle box in the garage all the time," he says. Lighting offers many exciting new choices: "You can control the light – it's not just a bright blaring dance floor or a dim cave anymore."

"We do the granite, the plumbing, the whole concept," he says. "I do have to say that Regency does not just rely on myself… we have a group of designers and architects who have been very loyal."

While kitchens and bathrooms generally become a permanent part of the home, there's no reason other custom furnishings can't move with you to a new house or condo.

"Most past customers do take furniture which we have built for them," DiMeglio says. To fit the new setting, Regency can make updates to the tone or colour. "It always looks built-in, but it will look built-in again once they move… nothing is left behind unless they decide to."

From those who do leave them behind, DiMeglio says he often hears that custom kitchens, bathrooms and built-in furnishings are a big reason for the home's sale. "Most do get paid back."

Usually, several areas of the home need work, but it's prioritized to minimize disruption. "There's no need to get everything done in one shot," he says. And there's huge satisfaction when the work finally is all done. "The customers make you feel amazing once the job is finished."

For a hands-on experience in custom kitchen cabinetry, LogArt Inc. (905-709-2722, www.logart.ca) offers a showroom with sample kitchens on display, including a full range of door styles. Offering everything from design consultation to full renovation service, LogArt combines the latest computer software with more than 30 years' professional experience to make kitchen renovations an exciting experience.

"People are amazed after we finish," says co-owner Manny. "They wonder if that's their kitchen, or if they've moved to a new house." The key to satisfaction is being open to the space's potential and "willing to change the walls, demolish walls and really give us the freedom to change the area."

Manny also sees exciting options today in newer appliances, such as built-in ovens and super-sized or counter-depth refrigerators. "It's a little bit wider than normal, but it's less deep so it's going to line up with the base cabinet" for a designer built-in look.

For the counter, beyond the basics, there are some great man-made stone and laminate finishes now. Manny says the company has a special now on granite counters. "We're working with the manufacturer… instead of paying $2, they might pay $1.20."

One of LogArt's specialties is kosher kitchens, creatively meeting space requirements like an extra sink by fitting one on each wall, or one on an island. "Sometimes, there are two dishwashers as well…even sometimes, two ranges, two ovens; it depends how big the house is," Manny says. The company is also closed on Shabbat.

While it's great to have a big kitchen, he says size is what you make of it. "You can move to a house of 3,000 square feet and it looks very tiny because the layout is not designed from the beginning the proper way." Even a small condo kitchen can become a spacious open-concept area with a little imagination. "We take advantage of every inch."

Within its range of services, LogArt will work with customers' existing contractors or provide its own reliable contractors.

Newest Liberty condos are red-hot... and green

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

These days, many condo developments say they're red-hot... but far fewer can say they're green. With its newest condos at Bathurst and Centre streets – in the heart of Thornhill's Jewish community – Liberty Development Corporation is definitely thinking green.

It helps that the Centre Park Condos are located in a five-acre city park (to be shared with the local community). And there's also a rooftop terrace, with planned barbecue and lounge areas, which – for many residents – may help ease the transition from living in a house to the convenience and ease of condo living.

Centre Park has many other great features going for it. Close to shopping and synagogues, it will also find itself in the heart of an established, planned community: Liberty already has three buildings open and a fourth under construction within its 24-acre Thornhill City Centre development.

"Somewhere around 1,300 residents already call this neighbourhood home," says Lori Nusbaum, Liberty's sales and marketing manager. "And about 500 more will be moving in this year."

Part of Liberty's appeal is its indoor amenities. Each building offers more than the comforts of home, with indoor pools, workout rooms, his and her saunas and lovely party facilities.

Because of its location, many visit the sales office asking about Shabbat elevators, which are already found in other Thornhill City Centre buildings. Nusbaum anticipates that they will be provided in Centre Park as well.

Starting from about $170,000, Nusbaum says Liberty is committed to extras you often can't find even at higher prices. "We listen to what our prospective purchasers are telling us... we truly offer the best value standard features," such as six appliances, upgraded baseboards, porcelain tile and granite countertops.

But Liberty's community-based approach is perhaps what sets it furthest apart. Where another developer might envision and plan a single building, Liberty has created a master-planned community, a condo neighbourhood where even small details make a big difference.

Fred Darvish, Liberty's president, is also an architect, says Nusbaum, and "when planning this community, took into account the fact that it was such an amazing area, with such great views. He put a lot of thought... into giving as many suites as possible unobstructed views as he could."

The Thornhill City Centre buildings are "not on top of each other, not each facing each other... the views that you get [from] a good part of the suites are unobstructed city and park views."

Nusbaum believes the community appreciates this thoughtful approach, and has seen many families with "repeat" purchasers. "One person in the family buys, then someone else in the next building. People bought condos for all their kids in each of the buildings," Nusbaum says. Keeping families together is just another reason for the ongoing success of Thornhill City Centre.

There are options for everybody at Centre Park, from one-bedroom to two-bedroom plus den. "There are 35 different floor plans," says Nusbaum. A two-bedroom model suite is on display at the sales office at 7890 Bathurst St. (just north of Centre), and it's recently been redecorated. "Even if you've come in previously," says Nusbaum, "there's something new to see."

The Centre Park sales office (905-731-8302) is open Monday to Thursday from noon until 7 p.m., closed Fridays, and open weekends and holidays from noon until 6 p.m. More information is available at www.centreparkcondo.com or at Liberty's main website at www.libertydevelopment.ca.

While most of Liberty's developments have been in York Region, Nusbaum says they are just branching out with a new development, Metro Place Condos, to be built near the Allen Road and Sheppard Avenue.

Like Centre Park, the four-building Metro Place will emphasize "green" space combined with a subway location and the superlative Liberty features that will certainly make it a red-hot success as well. More information is available by calling 416-630-5374 or visiting www.metroplacecondo.com.

Lighting can change a house dramatically

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Royal Lighting, a landmark at Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue (416-782-1129) for 25 years, has everything you need to light up your home both inside and out.

Michael Gladstone, general manager of the 10,000-square-foot store for 16 years, says that with lighting at every price and for every room of the house, "it's hard to estimate how much stock we actually carry."

Lighting, he says, can change a house dramatically. "It can be the focal point of a room, it can light up what's in the room, or it can be purely functional. It can do whatever you want it to do."

New shades are a great way to change the look of a lamp while saving money, he says. "You can make it more modern, more traditional, or merely change the colour. It's a simple change, but it can be a big change."

Ceiling fans are another economical way to change the look of a room, he says. "Fans look and feel great, but more than that, they are functional. They help save energy in the summer by lowering the temperature so the air conditioner can be set higher, and in the winter by bringing the warm air down to the first floor.

"Fans cost anywhere from $70 to $2,000, but the lower-priced ones work well."

Sales staff, some of whom have been at Royal Lighting for 15 to 20 years, are available to help customers decide what is best for their home, says Gladstone, who travels to Dallas, Tex., twice a year to attend the biggest lighting show in North America.

"We carry a huge selection, but with the proper guidance it's not difficult to choose what you need. If you're looking for lighting for the bathroom, tell us the size, the colour and whether it's a powder room or traditional bathroom. We can help you out."

They usually recommend halogen or strong incandescent vanity lights over the mirror in the main bathroom, he says, because people need strong light to shave or apply makeup. "These are things that people may not think of on their own."

Traditional crystal chandeliers are still important, says Gladstone, and even those who are downsizing can purchase one that fits in beautifully, he says.

"We have chandeliers in different sizes and colours, and for every taste from modern to traditional. New stock comes in constantly, so if you don't see what you like, you can come back in two weeks. You're certain to find something."

For the outdoors, he says, post lights offer security and beauty. "You want your house to look good, and you want your guests to be safe. You don't want anyone falling in the dark."

Lake Joseph resort offers affordable Muskoka retreats

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Owning a cottage is a dream for many of us, but with soaring real estate prices, it often isn't feasible for the dream to come true.

But what if you could own a cottage and only pay for the time you use it?

That is the concept behind the Muskokan Resort Club on Lake Joseph.

The sprawling 42-acre development of lavish villas offers fractional or shared ownership, whereby people can acquire a minimum one-tenth equity share (five weeks) of their vacation home and a proportionate share of the property's amenities.

"You choose your cottage location and design and then a maximum of 10 owners per cottage split the investment 10 ways," says the development's president, Walter Prychidny.

"We're trying to provide a solution to the real estate market where people can have a carefree investment that is proportionate to the time they use it."

Prychidny notes that fractional ownership is becoming increasingly popular, particularly because many cottage-goers want to have a fun-filled vacation without having to pay exorbitant prices and worry about upkeep and maintenance.

"When our owners come up, they bring their vacation clothes and we take care of the rest," he says, noting property maintenance, housekeeping and even pre-arrival grocery shopping are available at The Muskokan.

For cottage seekers in the market for shared and/or fractional properties, location and amenities are always key priorities.

To that end, Prychidny advises purchasing a lakefront property that has enough room for several family members and a host of amenities.

"In terms of amenities, it depends on what the consumer is looking for," he says.

"Because cottages tend to be a focal point for families, our villas have three bedrooms that can sleep eight. They are also fully furnished, have a private barbecue and fireplaces, and are on the lakefront."

The Muskokan offers a variety of hotel-style amenities on site, such as a spa, tennis courts, a swimming pool, children's playground and a multi-purpose sports court that accommodates such sports as basketball, volleyball, badminton and roller hockey.

A cottage's proximity to entertainment and recreation is another major factor to consider.

For instance, many people like to venture off-site to explore nearby towns for their restaurants and shops, or local golf courses.

"We have a pontoon boat that shuttles owners to nearby golf courses and restaurants," Prychidny says.

"We're also near Camp Aguda and Port Carling, as well as close to the town of Bala, which has a Cranberry Festival, Indian reservation and various artisan and crafts shops."

Phase 1 of The Muskokan is complete and Phase 2 construction is underway.

For information and viewing opportunities, call 1-866-960-9016 or visit www.muskokanclub.com.

Love your stone again with Marble Rescue

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to The CJN

It's not enough just to love your marble floors – you've got to show them love or they're going to lose their lustre.

In nature, we think of stone for its permanence and impenetrability. At home, though, it's a different story. Stone surfaces that are abused – not just on the floor but on countertops, tables and walls – can begin to show wear with chips, cracks or stains. That's where George Pettos and his company, Marble Rescue – 416-782-2833 (782-BUFF) – come in.

Pettos says surfaces are often damaged by well-intentioned household help. "A lot of people have cleaning ladies or nannies who use Windex and vinegar … that's the worst you can use for stone."

Stone floors can usually last about three to five years between "rescues," depending on traffic, but using a harsh household cleanser, it might only last one year before it needed touch-ups.

Whether your floors have been abused or well-maintained, or whether you're looking for a quick post-renovation clean-up, Pettos will come out and offer a free estimate. The work itself is usually scheduled within two weeks.

"We come in, grind the floor down, and after we grind it, we bring the natural polish back up, restoring the shine of the stone," Pettos says.

"When the floor is starting to deteriorate you can't see your reflection from the stone," Pettos adds. When Marble Rescue is finished, "you'll be able to see your reflection."

Even new floors and surfaces such as countertops need attention every few years. Marble, in particular, is a softer material that needs work more often than a harder stone, such as granite.

Pettos recommends granite over marble in the kitchen, where countertops will see not only wear and tear but potentially damaging spills and stains. "A spill of oil discolours the stone, makes it dark."

But never fear – Marble Rescue has the cure even for ugly stains. "We come in and put on a poultice. It sucks the stain out."

Pettos offers some a few important preventative measures you can take with countertops.

"It's very crucial to have it sealed." He also recommends a "honed" finish, which gives a matte surface that shows damage, stains and marks less easily than a semi- or high-polished finish. "A honed finish doesn't show as much as the polished look."

And, of course, make sure that all household help are aware of which cleansers to use on all stone surfaces, throughout your home. In the bathroom, for example, marble shower stalls can get the same soap scum buildup that other surfaces are susceptible to.

To maintain the stone after it's been polished and sealed, Pettos recommends that "the customer just needs to use water and a little bit of original dish soap." Choose an unscented brand, since lemon-scented ones may contain natural acids.

Marble Rescue's four full-time technicians have more than 15 years' experience and Pettos says his partner, Griffin Wolfe, has 30 years' experience, and personally oversees every job site. All workers are fully bonded and insured.

Beyond residential jobs, Marble Rescue has refinished many of the finest stone surfaces in southern Ontario, including at the Fallsview Casino, Bayer Pharmaceuticals, and many glittering condominiums throughout the Toronto area.

Even with the best maintenance, stone can also be damaged beyond just regular wear and tear. But whether it's a floor, wall, coffee table or vanity top, Marble Rescue invisibly fills in chips and cracks.

"We use marble filler, play with colour" before resealing the surface to restore its lustre, Pettos says.

Marble Rescue can also fix grout problems and even clean and restore glazed or unglazed ceramic and porcelain tile.

"People cannot do it themselves… anybody that has stone should have it cleaned and sealed every three to five years."

Carpets, hardwood, laminate – how do you choose?

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Carpets, hardwood, laminate! So many rooms, so many choices – but how do you make the right one? One thing is for sure – choosing from among different looks, trends and functions is a lot easier with the help of knowledgeable professionals.

With 12 showroom locations across Ontario, Giant Carpet and Flooring (www.giantcarpet.com, 416-636-6464) is one of the premier sources of flooring for homes. Vowing to always provide the customer with the best for less, Giant Carpet has been carrying quality carpeting, area rugs, hardwood, laminate, tile and decorative ceramics for more than 40 years.

Not only do the Giant Carpet showrooms have extensive selections, they are quite beautiful as well.

"Our customers are always wowed by our showrooms," says Claudia Wetzel, director of advertising and sales. If, however, choosing from the showroom is not your style, Giant Carpet now offers a shop-at-home option for customers who prefer to design their flooring from the comfort of their own home. Samples can be shipped directly to your home and decisions can be made from there.

In addition, if money is tight, you can use Giant Carpet's financing program, which includes interest-free options that let you enjoy your new flooring without paying the full cost in advance. Giant Carpet also guarantees installation within seven days of purchase. Their experienced installers will even move existing furniture and clean up after the installation!

Giant Carpet carries trusted names in carpeting and flooring, including Stainmaster and Beaulieu, as well as imported designer rugs from all over the world. In addition, Giant Carpet is on the cutting edge of flooring techniques.

"Flooring is now looked at more as fashion for the home, rather than just to walk on," Wetzel says. "Bamboo and cork are the new growing trends for floors, since they are extremely durable and environmentally friendly.

"We are featuring a new laminate product called Formica, which is available in many terrific patterns and colours," he says, adding that among other new options, "fibre floor from Tarkett is a vinyl product that is not like the vinyl flooring you remember from grandma's house."

While offering such a varied selection of carpet and flooring products, the Giant Carpet staff will ensure that you have chosen the right one for your home.

"We specialize in the flooring business and we truly care about our customers," Wetzel says. "Our customers' satisfaction is always 100 per cent guaranteed!"

If luxurious quality carpeting and rugs are what you are looking for, another great place to visit is Dominion Rug (www.dominionrug.com, 416-485-9488). Located at 3420 Yonge St., Dominion Rug celebrates its 60th year of serving the Greater Toronto Area this year. Dealing with both a residential and a commercial clientele, Dominion Rug offers a specialized selection of unique carpeting and exotic area rugs.

The staff work closely with the design trade, and Dominion Rug is affiliated with such reputable associations as the International Design Guild and Wools of New Zealand.

"Our certified installers have attended specialized training and courses to make them the best technicians, in order to handle the most difficult custom work and installations," says Ben Baum, the company's owner.

From installers to consultants, Dominion Rugs has an experienced and friendly staff. "Some members of our staff have been with us for over 45 years," Baum says.

Offering the most unique and intricate designs, Dominion Rug carries a large selection of exclusive collections from the likes of Frank Lloyd Wright, Barbara Barry and David Hicks, as well as a large selection of Tibetan rugs.

Dominion also manufactures custom designed carpets and rugs on an individual client basis. Whether it is for a living room or a company office, Dominion Rug is equipped with a certified in-house staff of experts who translate your design into carpet.

"We always make sure that you purchase the right product for the right purpose and that you are satisfied long after that purchase," says Baum.

To help ensure this satisfaction, Dominion Rug offers a one-year, free, unlimited spot-cleaning service, as well as on-call service managers to attend to any problems you may have. "The best advertising is a happy customer," Baum says.

To choose the right carpets or rugs for your home, Baum suggests that you consider their function. "People tend to be caught up in buying by the weight of a carpet," Baum says. "Just stick to the general rule of thumb that a higher density carpet keeps its appearance for longer. If you know that the area where the rug will be placed is a high-traffic area, make sure it's lightweight."

Whatever your carpeting needs may be, you can be sure that you will get the right advice at Dominion Rug.

"Our knowledge is unmatchable," Baum says. With such a large selection of samples (over 15,000) and such a highly qualified staff, you can also be sure that you'll be thrilled with your carpet for many years to come!

Downsizing seniors count on Marsha's Helping Hands

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When Marsha Silverberg began her career staging houses for real estate agents, she noticed that many of the elderly clients listing their homes were distressed about moving.

"It became extremely apparent that these fragile people needed a lot more than having their homes staged for resale. Through conversation I noticed a common thread," she says.

"They felt they were losing control of their lives and losing their identity by moving from a larger to a smaller space. Selling their homes was like they were letting go of their security blanket."

These observations led Silverberg to set up Marsha's Helping Hands (647-886-5437), which is geared specifically to helping seniors make the physical transition from their old to their new home, she explains.

"I jumped into a new business because I could see people overwhelmed by the changes. They were very anxious about where their possessions would go, where their heirloom furniture would end up."

Silverberg can help a senior move through all the stages of downsizing and relocating, from sorting and packing up their belonging to unpacking and setting up the new home.

"I'm super organized and very compassionate," she says.

"I work with distressed older adults whose families may not be available to participate in their transition to a new home. I provide a friendly, reliable and efficient service.

"What sets me apart from other packers is my empathy. I do this job with my heart and soul, as if I was packing up my own mother."

YOU CAN IS TIME YOU CAN BE NYTHING YOU

Marsha Silverberg

She notes that sometimes adult children initiate the contact with Marsha's Helping Hands. "Many children hire me because packing up their elderly parents can be an emotionally and physically draining endeavour."

The service starts with a consultation. Then Silverberg, who usually works on an hourly rate with an assistant, will get down "on her "hands and knees and go through the house layer by layer," to physically sort and organize a client's belongings. She dispenses with items that must be discarded, given away or sold, and packs up the rest for the move.

"I go through their possessions and organize their lives. I try to help them decide which things to keep or let go. You have to be very sensitive. Rather than say, 'You won't be needing the frying pan,' I say, 'You can let this go. You've done enough cooking for your family. Now it's time for someone to cook for you.'"

Silverberg can call a vintage furniture company or run garage and content sales to help the elderly person sell their valuables.

She notes that on the cover of her brochure is a picture of her parents because she created Marsha's Helping Hands as a way of honouring them. "My parents were Holocaust survivors. They were always there for me."

At the retirement home or new condo, her skills as a professional house stager also come in handy if she is asked to unpack and set up the new residence.

Although most seniors move because of personal losses, usually in health and mobility, or the death of a spouse, Silverberg aims to bolster her clients' confidence about making the transition to the new home. "I try to inspire them about looking forward to the next stage in their lives," she says.

"I make a scrapbook of the hand-chosen pictures that reflect their life history. We go through their pictures together as I am sorting. I present them with a beautiful photo album for their new home which they can put by their bedside."

Marsha's Helping Hands makes the difficult task of downsizing and relocating as positive as possible for clients, says Silverberg, adding that she find the work very rewarding.

"It's fulfilling for me. I have made a bond with the elderly client through our time spent together," she says.

"I've also helped a family that was very overwhelmed to pack up their loved one."

"I WANT...

...an active, fulfilling lifestyle without the hassles of maintaining a home."
...fine dining options, superior amenities and exceptional services."
...the convenience of a great location."

UIAFC sends $2 million to embattled Sderot

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

As Qassam rockets continued to rain down on the citizens of Sderot, halfway across the world, the United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) was in talks with the Jewish Agency to arrange for the allocation of $2 million to the town, which sits on the Gaza-Israel border.

"All of Canada stands behind the $2 million. It is a national decision made by the UIAFC… in recognition and response to the urgency of the developing situation in Sderot," said Linda Kislowicz, the UIAFC executive vice-president, last week.

The decision was made on May 17, just hours after Howard English, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's vice-president of corporate communications, announced that the federation was sending $1 million to Sderot.

"There were already conversations going on behind the scenes with leadership of the Jewish Agency and ourselves and our professionals in our Israel office. Things kind of converged a couple of hours ago and an agreement was made that we would, on a national basis, commit an additional million to the million that Toronto was already committing," Kislowicz said.

English said that the federation was originally planning to send $500,000 as part of a Canadian fundraising program they'd been working on over the past few months.

But when the federation decided to bump up the funds to $1 million and fast-track the initiative to send the funds to Sderot as soon as possible due to the escalation of the attacks, UIAFC jumped on board and doubled the gift.

"We had committed $500,000 as part of a Canadian fundraising program. It was a $1-million

Congress headed for joint presidency

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

For the first time in its history, Canadian Jewish Congress will be led by two presidents.

Sylvain Abitbol, the candidate put forward by Congress' nominations committee, and Rabbi Reuven Bulka, a competing candidate who claims grassroots appeal, will share the presidency over a two-year term. Negotiations to create a joint presidency were under way when The CJN went to press and were not completely finalized.

However, Abitbol and Rabbi Bulka issued a joint release late last week announcing that the co-presidency "makes sense at the current time of transition at CJC and given the advocacy challenges we face as a community. This alliance will productively unite our own partisans through a renewed Canadian Jewish Congress in support of the larger Jewish agenda upon which we both agree."

Abitbol and Rabbi Bulka agreed they would recommend to the plenary "the establishment of three national regional vice-presidents to ensure that the unique interests of the Jewish community across Canada

The News in Brief

CANADA

Manor Blames Lawyer

TORONTO — Boaz Manor, the co-founder of Portus Alternative Asset Management Inc., blames a Portus lawyer for the hedge fund's 2005 collapse, according to a report presented to a court last week by the fund's trustee, which rejected Manor's story. The accounting firm KPMG said that Manor blamed Anthony Malcolm for the collapse, but it found Manor's account "not credible." Manor and Portus co-founder Michael Mendelson were charged by the Ontario Securities Commission last year with a number of offences related to Portus. They each face $5 million in fines and up to five years in jail. Manor fled to Israel in 2005, before the OSC seized Portus's assets. KPMG spoke to him in Israel.

Basketball Coach Dies

MONTREAL — Harvey Liverman, a fixture on the Montreal basketball scene who was active in the sport with Maccabi Canada and as a longtime assistant coach with the Concordia Stingers, died May 10 at age 58 following a recurrence of melanoma. Liverman played basketball at Loyola College in Montreal and once served as athletics director at Pripstein's summer camp. At Concordia University, he was assistant coach for the Stingers' 1989-90 Canadian Interuniversity Athletic Union national championship team. His previous bout of melanoma was 20 years ago.

Smichah For Smiley

TORONTO — Mark Smiley, director of education at Associated Hebrew Schools of Toronto, was the lone Canadian out of 18 men and women who were ordained by the Jewish Theological Seminary's rabbinical school at JTS' commencement exercises May 17 in New York. More than 160 degrees were conferred.

Iran Petition Tabled

OTTAWA — Ontario Tory MP Pierre Lemieux tabled a petition in Parliament last week, initiated by the Calgary Jewish Community Council, urging Ottawa to act against Iran for threats to "wipe Israel off the map." The petition calls on Ottawa "to take all possible measures to prevent the leadership of Iran from developing nuclear weapons or inciting or carrying out genocide." The petition, with more than 300 names, also urges Ottawa to "join international efforts to prosecute [Iranian President] Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for incitement to commit genocide, in violation of the UN Genocide Convention."

Firebombings Suspect Denied Bail

MONTREAL — The second of two men charged with setting off home-made explosives at a Jewish school in September and a Jewish community centre in April, as well as a series of other crimes, was denied bail last week.

Quebec Court judge Celine Lamontagne denied bail to Omar Bulphred, 21, on May 14. She also refused to grant bail to his alleged accomplice Azim Ibragimov, 23, last month. She said Bulphred should remain in custody until his trial is done because of the seriousness of the charges.

Omar Bulphred

The pair were arrested April 12 and face nine counts each. In addition to charges related to attacks on the chassidic Skver community's Toldos Yakov Yosef school in Outremont and the Snowdon YM-YWHA-Ben Weider Jewish Community Centre, they are both charged with setting a car on fire, conspiracy to commit a kidnapping and an armed robbery, and threats against a person's life and to damage property.

Ibragimov was due back in court this week, while Bulphred is scheduled to make his next appearance June 1. He was studying at a trade school before his arrest.

Groups Seek Standing

REGINA — Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith have applied for intervenor status in the Crown's appeal in the hate crimes case against native leader David Ahenakew. The former Assembly of First Nations head was convicted in in 2005 of wilfully promoting hatred against Jews for admiring remarks he made about Hitler to a reporter in 2002. A judge overturned the ruling on appeal, saying the trial judge didn't consider if Ahenakew intended to promote hatred. The appeal judge ordered a new trial. The Crown is appealing that decision, and the overturning of Ahenakew's original conviction, the Regina Leader-Post reported.

Parents get 'sticker shock' as CHAT boosts fees

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Tuition at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto has risen almost 10 per cent to $17,150 for next fall, an increase the school attributes mainly to higher pension contributions and operating costs at its northern branch's new Vaughan home.

The increase is $1,500 more than this year's tuition of $15,650, and more than triple the magnitude of last year's increase, when tuition rose three per cent from $15,150 for the previous school year.

This year's percentage increase is higher than average for Toronto's Jewish day school system, but not unprecedented. Last year, fees at Jewish schools in the GTA rose between three and eight per cent. However, in 2003, tuition at Associated Hebrew Schools rose 12 per cent, sparking a protest at the time among some parents.

This year, following the announcement of next year's tuition at TanenbaumCHAT, board president Lori Disenhouse said she has not received any phone calls or e-mails complaining about the increase.

Informally, however, people have approached her to discuss it. She has been hearing two things, she said. The first is "almost sticker shock… but they understand. And the second category is an expression that this is just very difficult financially, to which I can only say it is, and we're very concerned."

Randall Craig, who has a son in Grade 9 at the school and two daughters in grades 5 and 7 at Associated, told The CJN that he and his wife have already made sacrifices in other areas to send their children to Jewish schools.

Tuition set at $17,150

An author who runs his own consulting company, Craig said his family is not eligible for financial assistance. "Without a question, our contributions [to Jewish charities] will be cut, and I make no apologies for us… Jewish education is critically important."

In an April 25 letter to parents, Disenhouse and Paul Shaviv, the school's director of education, attributed the increase to two main factors: new Ontario guidelines for pension plans that mandate "significantly higher employer contribution rates" and the move of the school's northern campus to the new Jewish community campus at the corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Avenue in Vaughan.

Also, "normal increases in teacher salaries, about four per cent a year" contributed to the increase, Shaviv told The CJN.

The decision to raise tuition was necessary but "very, very painful and difficult," said Disenhouse, who explained that the amount is reached through "zero-based budgeting. That means that every year we start from scratch, looking at our expenses and classroom allocations. The budget we get [more than $23 million for the coming year] is an actual reflection of the cost of running the school."

Parents are involved in every stage of the budgeting process, Disenhouse noted. "Every effort is made to minimize the cost. We scrutinize line by line, but you have to ensure the quality of the education, and that is the bottom line."

Both Shaviv and Disenhouse stressed in separate interviews that the school has benefited from relatively low operating costs at its current rented premises on Wright Street in Richmond Hill, where it has been since the northern branch opened in 2000 and where its lease is up this year. "No matter where we would have moved, we were looking at a huge increase in operating costs," Disenhouse said.

Operating costs at the new school are expected to be similar to those at Tanenbaum-CHAT's Wilmington Avenue location, the letter said.

Shaviv added that the tuition increase "has nothing to do with the capital costs of the new campus." The new 110,000-square-foot school has been designed to run as a "high-efficiency, low-cost, low-maintenance" building, he said.

Enrolment does not appear to have been affected by the tuition increase, according to Shaviv. "Next year we have a record enrolment," he said. Applications for Grade 9 students entering the northern campus have increased "more than 30 per cent – I think nearer 40 per cent," he said.

Transitions underway

From the editor's desk

In this week's issue we carry an article written by Ari Kelman (see page 34). He and Steven M. Cohen are the co-authors of a newly published study commissioned by the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies called The Continuity of Discontinuity.

The study explores the various ways in which young Jews in the age group 18 to 35 are expressing their need to "do Jewish."

The authors studied four different initiatives of young Jews in four cities in North America, one of the initiatives being a discussion salon that meets regularly in downtown Toronto, the brainchild of writer Mireille Silcoff.

As Kelman writes, each of the initiatives represents a uniquely different response to institutional Jewish life.

This age grouping of young Jews is "inventing new communal outlets and projects that reflect their individuality and commitment to living meaningful Jewish lives.

"In cities across the country, they are creating their own minyanim instead of joining synagogues; they are writing and publishing their own journals instead of just subscribing to existing ones; they are playing their own music, putting out records and producing their own concerts. They are hosting salons and movie screenings. They are involved in the creation of Jewish life that is thoughtful, popular and exists largely on the margins of mainstream Jewish organizational life."

Among the many observations in the study, this is the key one: the younger generation is rejecting – it is not too strong a term – joining the institutions that their parents, grandparents and great-grandparents established as the main denominators of Jewish communal life in North America.

"These new endeavours do not look like their predecessors," Kelman writes, "because they are responding to the perception that the offerings of synagogues, federations and JCCs are simply too narrow and do not adequately address the diverse needs of American Jews."

The study is profoundly important for us – especially, we who are the parents of the 18 to 35 cohort. It teaches us a great deal about the Jewish inclinations of our children. It is part of a growing library of information regarding how the younger generation relates to their Judaism.

The Continuity of Discontinuity is the latest in a series of studies commissioned by the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies specifically aimed at ascertaining the "Jewish" behaviour of the younger, college-age and up, generation.

That study looked at religious identity, practice and civic engagement among 18- to 25-year-old Catholics, Protestants, Muslims and Jews. The authors noted that the "majority of the Jewish group was largely positive about their Jewish identities but unsure as to how their religious identities played out in their daily lives."

The study that followed was called Grande Soy Vanilla Latte with Cinnamon, No Foam: Jewish Identity and Community in a Time of Unlimited Choices.

Its executive summary identifies the study's main finding. "For American Jews in Generation Y, being Jewish is not their sole identity… Today's young Jews have multiple identities shaped by many factors, including intermarriage in their families, diverse social networks and dynamic boundaries around geography and other identity characteristics such as gender and sexual orientation. Being Jewish is part of a larger identity mosaic for today's Jews."

That study was followed by Israel in the Age of Eminem.

Its conclusions were rather stark and sobering: "Most traditional communications and marketing strategies [regarding Israel and support for the Jewish state] are not reaching the vast majority of young Jews [18 to 35]."

And it foreshadowed the findings in the Kelman-Cohen report regarding the diverse manners of Jewish expression and commitment among the younger generation. "Culture has replaced tradition and spirituality has replaced religion. Their [the 18-to-35 age group] association with Israel is frighteningly weak and ill-defined despite its near daily appearance in the news headlines."

Every institution of organized Jewish life, even The CJN, one of the older "institutions" of Jewish Canada, must take note of the information and cumulative knowledge that the Bronfman studies provide concerning the evolving preferences, practices and needs of the younger generation. Are they a temporary, interim stop along a longer path of life? Or are they suggestions of more permanent developments?

Where we can, where our own Jewish sensibilities allow, we must adapt. Where we cannot, however, we must try, nevertheless, to understand the transformations under way below us.

We must use the rich, eye-opening information from the Bronfman studies at least as a bridge connecting the generations that must always know and want to call themselves Jews.

CANADIAN GIFT CHANGES LIVES

Bar Ilan University's School of Social Work, established in 1966, was recently dedicated in the name of Louis and Gabi Weisfeld. Torontonian Gabi Weisfeld, president of the Canadian Friends of Bar Ilan University, donated $3 million (US) to the school in Ramat Gan, Israel, in memory of her late husband, Louis Weisfeld, who died in 1996. At the dedication ceremony, Weisfeld said she chose the school because it trains people who will help improve society in Israel and around the world. University president Moshe Kaveh, spoke of the importance of the Jewish value of chesed at the school, which helps members of the community who need social services. The gift will help fill faculty positions and establish more scholarships. Black Panther leader not allowed into Canada

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The U.S. head of the New Black Panther Party was barred from Canada last week, and the two Jewish advocacy organizations that pushed for his exclusion are anything but apologetic about it.

Canadian Jewish Congress and B'nai Brith Canada say Malik Zulu Shabazz is an anti-Semite and hatemonger and should be ineligible to enter Canada to address anyone, let alone a black group concerned with issues of racism and violence.

Referring to suggestions from Nkem Anizor, president of New Black Youth Taking Action, the group that sponsored Shabazz's proposed Toronto visit, that the Jewish community should not have interfered with his trip, Congress spokesperson Len Rudner said "that's a rather foolish point of view. When you look at the man's public record… it stretches credulity that this group did not know Mr. Shabazz's public record before they invited him. It's clearly anti-Semitic and murderous anti-Zionism."

Anita Bromberg, director of legal affairs for B'nai Brith, said Shabbaz has "repeated anti-Semitic messages, advocated violence and that black youth do not co-operate with police. That's very troubling to the human rights community."

Shabbaz, a lawyer, had been invited to address a rally at Queen's Park, as well as a meeting at Ryerson University. Anizor told a news conference that the "Jewish lobby" prevented Shabazz from entering Canada from the United States.

"What's to blame is the power of the Jewish lobby to influence politicians, to influence media, to influence whatever it took. Because it took one letter, one press release from B'nai Brith and the firestorm began," she said. "They've injected themselves, trying to dictate who the black community can and cannot hear."

She said she wanted to draw attention to Ontario's Safe Schools Act, to black-focused curricula and schools and a superjail for youth in Brampton.

Shabazz was turned away at Pearson International Airport and later tried to enter Canada overland by car, but was turned back again. He told the National Post that his views have been "grossly mischaracterized" and that he is anti-Zionist, not anti-Semitic.

However, the U.S.-based Anti-Defamation League has compiled a two-page dossier of quotations attributed to Shabazz that show he shifts readily between attacks on Jews and Zionists. In a 2001 address at the National Press Club in Washington, he is quoted as saying, "we have to make it plain that Zionists control America, lock, stock and barrel, the European Jews have America under control, lock, stock and barrel, the media, foreign policy."

At a protest in front of the B'nai Brith building in Washington, D.C., in 2002, he is quoted as leading chants saying: "death to Israel," "the white man is the devil," and "jihad." He also said, "Kill every goddamn Zionist in Israel. Goddamn little babies, goddamn old ladies. Blow up Zionist supermarkets."

Speaking of police violence, he reportedly said that "the only solution any time there is a funeral in the black community is a funeral in the police community."

Rudner, Congress' director of community relations, said that when he learned of Shabazz's proposed appearance in Canada, Congress contacted Ryerson University, Queen's Park, and federal government officials, informing them of Shabazz's record.

Anger at Congress for the cancellations is misplaced, Rudner said, suggesting Shabazz's hosts brought the controversy on themselves.

"It is the job of Congress, it is our communal responsibility, to advocate on behalf of our community. For this group to believe they can bring in a speaker with a 10-year history of anti-Semitic comments and have Congress remain silent, that is naivete of the highest order."

Bromberg said B'nai Brith was sensitive to the ostensible goals of Shabazz's Toronto hosts – addressing issues of concern to young blacks. But she added: "You don't counter hate with hate. You don't counter racism with racism. You don't counter violence with advocacy for violence."

She rejected suggestions that B'nai Brith's opposition gave Shabazz unwarranted publicity. "We also believe you can't stay silent and be a bystander to racism," she said.

B'nai Brith will continue to work with leaders in the local black community to address issues of violence and poverty, Bromberg added.

CJC, federation favour public solution to funding issue

By MARK ANSHAN and STEVEN SHULMAN

Ontario is home to more than 40 Jewish day schools educating 13,000 students in Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and London. Because these schools benefit both the Jewish community and, more importantly, society at large, Ontario's Jewish day schools deserve a sustainable public funding solution.

Guest Voice

The objective of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and Canadian Jewish Congress is the extension of public funding to Ontario Jewish day schools and other faith-based schools by incorporating these schools into public education, based on adherence to government standards.

Ontario meets its constitutional obligations by funding Catholic schools, which provide excellent education to one-third of this province's publicly funded students. However, Ontario is the only jurisdiction in the western democratic world to fund one faith-based school system to the exclusion of all others. Other faith-based schools merit the same opportunity to be brought under the umbrella of public education.

That is a message we have been vigorously articulating, and we believe that decision-makers are listening to what many perceive as good public policy.

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario region, in co-operation with Jewish federations in Ottawa, Hamilton and London, have built consensus among day-school education stakeholders to support the following core principles for public funding of faith-based schools:

- Education is a core Jewish value and Jewish education is essential to transmit our heritage. Jewish day schools deliver high quality education that ensures our community's significant contribution to society.
- Jewish day school education, like public school education, is part of the public trust. Jewish day schools should be within Ontario's public sphere of education.
- Ontario's faith-based schools should be treated equitably, regardless of religious affiliation.
- Just as other schools in the public sphere follow Ministry of Education criteria, Jewish day schools would also meet appropriate approved provincial criteria and accountability requirements.

These principles are not theoretical. Publicly funded faith-based education has found ways to remain unique and embrace public accountability in other parts of Canada and the world.

In our pursuit of a solution anchored in these principles, we are meeting regularly with officials from all parties, and we have developed a solid working relationship with many of them. Our respectful, responsible and effective approach to advocacy has supporters.

On April 26, Liberal MPP Peter Fonseca attempted to introduce an unfair resolution that opposed in principle funding schools currently outside the public system. The resolution, staunchly opposed by Conservative MPPs Frank Klees and Tim Hudak, failed on a voice vote in the legislature when Liberal MPPs of conscience refused to support it.

We are encouraged by this result, and recognize that regardless of who wins the next election, positive relationships with political decision-makers from all parties, based on constructive and reasonable dialogue, is critical to winning this struggle.

We also understand that success requires co-operation with other faith communities. We have built working relationships with representatives of Armenian, Sikh, Muslim and other communities, all of whom appreciate the need for principled, responsible and effective advocacy for faith-based school funding.

Within Ontario's Jewish community, we keep close contact with day schools in Toronto, Ottawa, Hamilton and London. As key stakeholders, these schools have helped formulate our core principles and will be essential to implementation if we are able to realize political success. We are also enhancing our dialogue with day school parents and are pleased to meet with any school group to discuss our approach.

However, your participation is vital to success. With the provincial election approaching, candidates of all parties need to hear how important this issue is to you and our community. We also need to hear directly from you, whether you are a past or present day school parent, a school board member, a school official or just concerned about fair funding as a means to strengthen education in Ontario.

Please let us know your thoughts and your experiences so we can incorporate them into our advocacy efforts and post them on our website, www.fundingfairness.ca. Contact Jonathan Schwartz, our education policy advisor, at 416-635-2883, ext. 265, or jschwartz@on.cjc.ca.

By working together to expand public education, we can help create the best conditions to sustain and strengthen Jewish day schools for generations to come, and help our children continue to make significant and unique contributions to Ontario, Canada and the Jewish world. •

Mark Anshan is general counsel and director of public affairs at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto. Steven Shulman is Ontario regional director and national general counsel of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Funds to help send kids to summer camp

program from across the country, and our portion was $500,000," English said. "But now, since Sderot has been bombarded in the most severe way over the past few days, we decided that we're going to send $1 million right away… We made that decision because it would be unconscionable not to do so. The city of Sderot is in both a terrifying and horrifying position right now and we have to help. We're responsible."

Since Israel's disengagement from Gaza in 2005, more than 4,000 rockets have struck Sderot, and since last week, it has reportedly been struck by about 70 rockets.

Among the injured are a 70-year-old woman who was seriously wounded when her house was hit by a rocket and two students who were lightly wounded when a high school was directly hit. A mother and her nine-year-old daughter were two of the many who have been treated for shock since last week.

"They're dealing with 24 hours of tension, they're dealing with sleeplessness, with depression in some cases, with frequent absences from work and school. They're dealing with the inability to concentrate on anything but when the next attack is going to take place. They're dealing with insecurity every second of their lives, and I don't think anyone here can appreciate what that means because there is no comparable situation that we have faced in Toronto to educate us about what the people of Sderot are going through," English said.

Danyael Cantor, executive vice-president of FEDERATION CJA in Montreal, said that his federation was very involved in this initiative and advocated that Sderot be approached as a project that was deserving of attention by all the Canadian communities.

He said that this initiative is particularly important to his community, because Montreal is a twin community of Be'er Sheva, where several hundred people from Sderot relocated last week.

"Montreal is in daily contact with Be'er Sheva and is intimately involved in addressing this challenge because we're partners with that community," Cantor said.

English said that they'd been in close touch with Ze'ev Bielsky, chair of the Jewish Agency, about what needs to be done for the citizens in Sderot.

"One of the main uses for the funds we'll be sending is a program to send the children of Sderot to summer camps in safer parts of the country. A large chunk of the funding will give kids respite from the constant rocket attacks," English said.

"Some of the money will go towards trauma counselling and some of the money will go toward educational enrichment for school children, because even when school is open, many children are incapable of going to school. They just can't concentrate enough to go to school."

He added that the Jewish Agency is already planning summer camp getaways based on the Canadian commitment.

"I would say they're planning with the certainty that the money will come because we've demonstrated during the [Second Lebanon] War that when we say the money is going to come, it's going to come," English said.

"This is going to happen fast. We're going to fast-track this, and they're already making decisions based on their knowledge that the funds are coming. Ze'ev Bielsky actually joined our executive committee call briefly to thank us and assure us that this would be in the system very quickly," Kislowicz said.

English said he hopes this initiative will inspire other communities to help Israelis in need.

"It is our objective to be among the first in the world to provide assistance … We really want to be a catalyst for tremendous global generosity towards Sderot and any other communities that are experiencing the same kind of difficulty," English said.

"We don't need to wait to be invited in. We know what our role and our responsibility is, and that is to be with our partners every step of the way," Cantor said.

A relief fund has also been established for the community to contribute to Sderot. Donations are being accepted at www.ujadonations.com/sderot or by phone at 416-631-5705.

Moveathon marks 10 years

The Zareinu Moveathon is celebrating its 10th anniversary with a children's festival at Downsview Park on June 10, as well as 50- and 100-kilometre bike rides along the Niagara Escarpment on June 24.

Both events are in support of the Zareinu Educational Centre, a treatment facility and school for children with a wide range of physical and developmental challenges.

At the June 10 festival, children of all ages and abilities can take part in such activities as laser tag, paintball, pony rides, mechanical and inflatable rides, musical performances and bike rides.

For the first time, the event is partnering with Special Olympics Ontario, Toronto region, which will run a sports clinic for children of all abilities.

Two weeks later, bike riders 16 years and older are invited to take part in a police-monitored "pro tour," which starts and ends at the Milton Sports Centre and features pre- and post-ride massages.

Also for the first time, 33 students enrolled in the new leadership program at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) south campus have taken on the moveathon as their final class project.

The Grade 12 course requires students to take on a collective project in which they can apply the program's interdisciplinary physical education and biblical Jewish studies.

The practicum is based on the concept of leadership in sports: captaining, coaching, teamwork, and the theoretical study of traditional Jewish values from biblical events.

Tamara Rebick, co-director of student activities at CHAT and co-founder of the program, said the curriculum "allows students to participate in real life situations and apply traditional Jewish values to modern day experiences."

Has Abbas learned?

It was all so predictable. It was clear to everyone but Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas that Hamas would not coexist alongside Fatah. That's because Hamas will not coexist alongside Israel, and Fatah has committed to the entire world that coexistence is an unbreakable promise.

The vicious fighting that erupted last week in Gaza between Hamas and Fatah is merely the latest act in the seething, violent drama for control between the two contending Palestinian factions. As of this writing, 44 Palestinians had been killed in the five days of fighting since it began a week ago Sunday.

Most observers concluded that Hamas had gained the upper hand in the current round of inter-factional fighting as the majority of the slain fighters had been from Abbas' Fatah forces.

However, they also concluded that the Hamas leaders had overplayed their hand by deliberately targeting Israelis in Sderot and further to the north, in Ashkelon.

As of Friday morning, some 70 Qassam rockets had been fired into Israel, striking schools, synagogues, homes and places of work. Israel retaliated with precision attacks against Hamas military cells and their confederates. But the galvanization of collective Palestinian anger against the Israelis that Hamas had anticipated as a result of the retaliation did not materialize. Indeed, Fatah fighters and much of non-combatant Palestinian society seem to have understood that in defending their own people, Israel was also helping to rescue them as well.

Abbas has been frequently counselled about the impossibility of sharing power with Hamas, about the fundamentalist party's destabilizing influence. And the warnings were not always from Israeli officials.

Last week, Ha'aretz reported that Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak voiced great concern to visiting officials about the increasing strength of Hamas. He is reported to have said that "Hamas will never sign a peace agreement with Israel if it stays in power."

The Egyptian leader has good cause to be concerned about Hamas, in light of its growing ties with the radical Muslim Brotherhood, Mubarak's main opposition. He has even begun barring senior Hamas leaders from entering Egypt as a way of preventing contacts with the Muslim Brotherhood, Ha'aretz reported.

Hamas' ties with the Brotherhood are of a piece with its ties to the Muslim radicals in Iran. Both are intent on erecting Islamic societies upon the rubble and waste of the existing Israeli one, as well as upon secular Muslim societies that offend their rigorous Islamic sensibilities. Mubarak and other rulers in the area, such as Jordan's King Abdullah, understand this threat to their respective countries very well.

"With Hamas no way," Mubarak is reported to have said last week about the prospects for peace.

Would Mahmoud Abbas now say the same thing?

The enterprise of Palestinian statehood requires that he must.

Assault on student is a hate crime

A 16-year-old chassidic student was assaulted outside the Skvèr's community Toldos Yakov Yosef yeshiva in Montreal on May 10 ("Man arrested for punching chassidic teen," CJN, May 17). The very same school that was firebombed in September 2, 2006. Coincidence?

The accused assailant told police that he thought the beating victim was "somebody else." Chassidic children attending such schools are easily distinguishable by their appearance. How could one even come close to making such an identity error?

Police say there is no evidence that this is a hate crime. Considering the victim's attire, a simple conclusion would be that they are wrong.

Human rights in Lebanon, West Bank

The Israeli Human Rights Group, B'Tselem, and the Centre for the Defence of the Individual have reported, based on affidavits of 73 Palestinians detained by Israel between July 2005 and January 2006, that Israeli interrogators frequently beat Palestinian suspects, shackled them in painful positions and deprived them of sleep in defiance of a 1999 court ruling outlawing torture. If these reports are true, the actions cannot be condoned and the interrogators should be brought to justice.

It is worth noting in passing that the three Israeli soldiers held captive by Hezbollah in Lebanon and Hamas in the West Bank have not been seen by the Red Cross or the Red Crescent to ascertain if they are being treated humanely or not. It also goes without saying that there are probably no human rights agencies in either Lebanon or the West Bank to complain about the treatment of prisoners.

Passover food drives

UJA Federation of Greater Toronto has been supporting Cuban Jewry for many years. Why suddenly is there a separate and more aggressive campaign in recent years? Federations's launch of yet another fundraising campaign diverts much-needed funds away from local efforts ("Passover Cuba food drive attracts record number of donors," federation insert, CJN, April 26). The timing and duration of this specific Passover campaign seriously competes with not only National Council of Jewish Women of Canada, Toronto section's community-wide Passover food drive, but also the efforts of many others to ensure that local needs are met.

Federation's priority should be to generously support local community efforts. Charity begins at home.

Judaism and modernity

Neal Winokur in his letter "Jewish law and conversion" (CJN, May 3) provides us with the same attitude that we constantly hear from the Orthodox, namely that we can't change anything that tradition has handed down in the Talmud and the Shulchan Aruch.

However, what he does not apparently understand is that we no longer live in the world of Hillel and Shammai, of Johanan ben Zakkai, of Judah HaNasi, of Maimonides, or Joseph Caro. Instead we live in the world of Baruch Spinoza, who dared to base belief on reason, causing his excommunication from the Jewish community, but leading to modernity and our secular world. Many Jews are driven away from their heritage because they find Orthodoxy doesn't fit a 21st-century lifestyle. If the Orthodox wish to retain their loyalty to the past, that is up to them, but those who wish to live in today's world should not be rejected as heretics or apostates.

Wallenberg didn't die in 1947

We were very surprised to learn a stamp to honour Raoul Wallenberg is suggested to commemorate the anniversary of his "death" on July 12, 1947 ("Push for Wallenberg stamp may be too late," CJN, May 10). In fact, there is no evidence that Raoul Wallenberg died on that date. We, as well as academic researchers, Wallenberg's family and many others, cannot accept the Soviet uncorroborated version stating "circumstantial evidence" of his death in 1947 as fact. Far from it. There is mounting evidence that Wallenberg was alive well into the 1970s, if not longer.

Fundraising for day schools must be a priority

By JONATHAN S. TOBIN

Grade 1 and 2 students at Associated Hebrew Schools' Posluns campus enjoyed storytime with author Sharon Jennings during the school's day-long Festival of Canadian Writing earlier in the year.

For those who have been promoting the idea that Jewish communities must cease talking about the importance of day school education and start funding it adequately, the news late last month out of New Jersey was long overdue.

Jonathan S. Tobin

The United Jewish Communities of Metrowest New Jersey announced the launch on April 29 of a $50-million (US) campaign that will seek to increase enrollment and academic excellence at the three Jewish day schools that serve their northern New Jersey region.

According to the New Jersey Jewish News, 11 local families are already putting up $13.5 million toward the campaign, whose purpose will be to supplement current inadequate levels of funding for scholarships to the schools.

The plan is specifically aimed at helping middle-class families who may be too well off to qualify for current scholarship programs whose function is to help only those on the bottom of the economic ladder.

Past experiments, such as one in the 1990s in Seattle and the experience of one of the participating New Jersey schools, have shown that if tuitions are offered at a significant discount from the $10,000 to $25,000 that is routinely charged at schools around the country, then enrollment increases.

In that sense, New Jersey is no different from that of any other community. The exorbitant tuition fees charged by day schools can create a situation where quality Jewish education is the province of only the very well off, who can afford any price, and the relatively poor, who are eligible for scholarships. Everybody who doesn't fit into either category has to shoulder the burden of paying sky-high prices.

In particular, families with two, or three, or more kids in the system are asked to make enormous sacrifices.

While studies show that most Orthodox families will choose day schools no matter what the price, the vast majority of American Jews who are not Orthodox must be wooed by the day school movement. Unfortunately, the sticker shock created by the school's price tags are often enough to deter many parents.

The losers in that transaction are not just the children who will not get the immersion in Jewish heritage, values and Hebrew that only day schools can give them. An even bigger loser is the community as a whole.

That's because it has been proven over and over again that day schools do the best job in producing adult Jews who consider themselves part of the Jewish people. Such people stand out from the vast majority of American Jews, most of whom are functional illiterates when it comes to the vast treasure that makes up Jewish identity.

Day schools are not the only possible positive factor. Being raised in a home where Judaism is a priority and not a marginal burden is obviously a prerequisite. Summer camps and trips to Israel are also influential. Nor should we discount the effect of a really good supplemental synagogue school.

But excellent Hebrew schools are still the exception, not the rule.

There's no doubt that day schools remain the best investment that American Jewry can make and that their students will form the core of the community of the future.

But after we sing the praises of the New Jersey plan, observers must still wonder if it will succeed. Elsewhere, such efforts have been announced before, only to fall short of their goals because of the lack of public support.

Most troubling is the fact that a large portion of American Jewry is still uninterested in day schools at any price. As essays in an interesting collection edited by Jack Wertheimer on the question, Family Matters: Jewish Education in an Age of Choice, published by Brandeis University Press, point out, those of us who are more concerned with being "ghettoized" and cut off from the rest of society are unlikely to choose a day school.

> Who will step up to help reduce fees?

That is a largely unfounded fear. Outside of tiny haredi enclaves, it is impossible to isolate Jewish kids from mainstream secular culture. A far greater danger is the fact that most Jewish baby boomers are Jewishly ignorant and are raising children who know little more than their parents.

This widespread lack of acceptance of the importance of day schools is one reason why the decision of the Metrowest federation to make them a priority is crucial.

For generations, fundraising groups such as federations have given Jewish education short shrift. It is only in the last couple of decades that this has begun to change. As such, one of the prime virtues of the New Jersey effort is the symbolic effect of having a federation and its leading funders say that day schools aren't merely a good thing that deserve funding along with other worthy causes, but are the community's No. 1 priority.

The example of local leaders and federations making such a statement can have a double effect.

On the one hand, it can set an example for philanthropists who have hitherto not directed their efforts toward education or often even sent their own children to day schools. But as crucial as it is that we create a system in which the best Jewish education is readily affordable for everyone rather than just the rich or the poor, it is also vital to send a message to the public that these schools aren't merely the preserve of the most religious among us, but are a lifeline to a Jewish future and are literally for everyone.

While it is obvious that the New Jersey initiative ought to be replicated around the country, the question of whether it can or will be is open to debate.

For example, here in Philadelphia, discussions about a similar sort of plan, which would have as its goal the creation of an endowment that would effectively lower local day school tuitions across the board, have been underway for some time. But it is, at this moment, far from clear that such an announcement would be followed by sufficient donations that would transform it from a much needed dream into reality. What is lacking is not the plan but the money.

There have been some recent signs of progress on this front. Earlier this spring, Leonard Barrack, a local attorney and the man nominated to lead the Jewish Federation of Greater Philadelphia starting in September of this year, announced a $5-million gift from his family to the Akiba Hebrew Academy (which will be renamed after Barrack's late brother), a non-denominational middle and high school, to increase scholarships and academic excellence.

But if this act is to have a community-wide impact, it must be followed by similar efforts by others for all the local day schools. A commitment on the part of a broad coalition of philanthropists to a community-wide plan similar to that announced in New Jersey isn't an option; it's an imperative.

The question here, as is the case throughout the country, is who will step up and set such a campaign in motion? The answer to that is to be found not only among the wealthy but in whether American Jews in general begin to lift their voices to make it clear that the time for delay is long past.

Home movies vs. home cooking

Technology is so wonderful, it manages to mess everything up.

The camera allows us to perfectly record events. My wedding of 15 years ago is ready to be relived at a moment's notice. My 11-year-old twins are still celluloid toddlers, swaddled in diapers and playing on the floor. My life has been preserved in megabytes and videotape.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

But all this photography can be too much of a good thing. People can be so absorbed in taking pictures that they forget to experience life itself. Perhaps the photographic class could gain something by occasionally putting their cameras down.

Dana Chidekel, "a memory-card-carrying member" of the photographic class, wrote in Newsweek about the time she forgot to bring her video camera to her daughter's recital: "She sang in a high, clear soprano voice that stunned me. I don't recall taking a breath… At the conclusion, I was crying… I could have kicked myself for not bringing the video camera, but… not filming was what allowed me to have the unadulterated joy of this experience. Freed from the demand to document what was happening, I could live it."

In the end, home movies are two dimensional. The Zohar says, "God desires the heart." This is true not only of our relationship with God, but of any interpersonal experience. Ultimately, what touches the heart is more memorable than images or sounds. While a movie may be a slice of life, standing behind the camera can cut you off from reality.

Our interest in photography distorts something fundamental about life as well. While "quality time" events such as school recitals are important life moments, the fabric of love is primarily woven in simpler settings. Indeed, the experiences that touch the heart the most don't always translate into good cinema.

Some critics get annoyed when I mention food at funerals. "What difference does it make," they tell me, "if she made good blintzes and chicken soup?" I understand the sentiment. To them, talking about Bubbie's Friday night menu trivializes the real depths of her love.

But home cooking is one of those trivial things that is so important. Home cooking is about love. Each bite is a symbol of how Bubbie poured her heart into nourishing, caring for and loving her family.

This is love you can taste and remember. An ounce of affection is in every spoon of chicken soup.

People don't take home movies of family meals, because they're boring. But that doesn't matter. You can't take a movie of a person's heart. And good home cooking is filled with love.

The difference between home cooking and home movies is in the heart. A photograph may capture the moment, but chicken soup can capture someone's heart.

And all that matters is the heart.

Israelis take stock of their middle-aged state

Like vigorous baby boomers who wonder whether their current good health or inevitable decline is the more defining reality, Israelis celebrated their country's 59th anniversary uncertain about the state of their state.

Gil Troy in Montreal

From the outside, Iranians' and Palestinians' genocidal threats – reinforced by a relentless assault on Israel's politics, history and ideology – makes the Jewish national project appear precarious. From within, post-Lebanon-war recriminations, political corruption, ideological drift, and social tensions intensify the pessimism.

Yet, this supposedly dysfunctional society is remarkably functional. Palestinian terrorism has been reduced, with the improved security restoring Israel's characteristically vibrant normalcy. The stock market is booming as Israelis continue their friendly competition with Americans for the title of world's most charitable citizens, based on donations per capita. Even the summertime war produced a bomb-shelter-induced baby boom this spring. Never underestimate a country whose citizens can transform being bombed into making babies.

The magic numbers four billion, 3,186,739, 257,000, 9.2 and 2.7 quantify Israel's everyday miracles.

- Billionaire Warren Buffett spent $4 billion buying Iscar, part of foreigners' $23.7 billion investment in Israel's economy, which grew 4.5 per cent in 2006.
- In a country of seven million people, 3,186,739 Israelis voted in the 2006 election, the Middle East's 17th free election, uniquely involving Muslims, Christian and Jews.
- Israel's marvellous universities teach 257,000 students cutting-edge and traditional skills.
- The percentage of the Israeli economy devoted to the non-profit sector – 9.2 per cent, ranking the county fourth worldwide – illustrates Israelis' exceptional commitment to charity, volunteering, and tikkun olam, fixing the world.
- Finally, the Israeli Jewish birthrate of 2.7 children per woman represents the highest rate among developed countries. More than 100,000 new babies last year joined a future-oriented, family-friendly, community-building, values-rich society.

Still, the country faces serious problems, many of which are Israel's version of broader western dilemmas. While Israel's quest for peace with its hostile neighbours is unique, the underlying dilemma is familiar to post-9/11 westerners. Many Israelis have lost faith in diplomacy. The failure of the Oslo peace process to yield peace despite major Israeli concessions, along with the exterminationist culture feeding Islamist terrorism, has made many peaceniks skeptics. Diplomacy requires certain common rules and limits. Just as Cold War liberals wondered whether it was possible to negotiate with Communists, most Israelis and westerners doubt diplomacy can work with jihadists.

While Israel's neighbours need to restore Israeli faith in diplomacy, Israel's leaders need to re-establish their people's trust. The scale of corruption is outrageous. Israelis wonder whether their leaders are a particularly bad bunch, whether society is experiencing a deeper values crisis, or whether the investigative scrutiny magnifies misdeeds into major crimes. Amid the modern media magnifying glass, Israel desperately needs worthy successors to David Ben-Gurion and Menachem Begin, founding fathers of the country who despised each other ideologically while both leading simple, modest lives.

Whatever explanation people offer for the corruption contagion, Israel's material success has triggered a broader cultural crisis that all westerners will recognize. The new generation of Israelis – especially the secular majority – tends to be wealthier, more individualistic, more self-confident and more selfish than the founders' generation of only decades ago.

Modern Israelis, like so many of us, are the children of modern consumerism, with television-compressed attention spans and iPod-induced self-involvement that's balanced out by computer-fed creativity and connectivity. Israelis have to develop a communal ethos that cultivates modern individualism and ingenuity without abandoning a sense of national mission and idealism.

For a people battered recently and historically, the ability to be normal is quite exceptional. Living well truly is the best revenge, a repudiation of Nazi exterminationism as well as Palestinian terrorism. Israelis do and should delight in sharing their modern dilemmas with fellow westerners. At the same time, this celebration of normalcy and the powerful realities of daily living should not eclipse the special dimensions of Israeli life or the country's unique challenges, even though they appear to Israelis living through them as quite normal, or at least familiar.

The Zionist revolution built on Jews' exceptional history and sense of togetherness while promoting a vision of national normalcy. Modern Israel dances on the head of a similar pin, hoping, like the traditional fiddler on the roof, not just to keep balance but to live a life filled with meaning and joy.

Science, literature, and revelation

In the community where I grew up, adults expressed great pride in the community's young people as they progressed through their schooling and remained connected with Jewish practice. There was a special pride for those who pursued studies – and ultimately careers – in science. So-and-so is a physicist, you would hear people say, and he still goes to shul on Shabbat. So-and-so is a biochemist, and he still wears a kippah. These remarks bespeak a centuries-old conflict that western culture perceives between science and religion. Once you know of the existence of subatomic particles, so goes the thinking, belief in God flies out the window.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

This attitude always surprised me. Judaism has never made a fetish of opposing spirit and matter, belief and science, faith and logic. Among my friends who went into the sciences, rarely did work in the lab inspire a crisis of belief. Indeed, some – those, I like to think, with souls of poets – went so far as to explain that what they learned of quarks, black holes, and gamma rays magnified their awe of creation. One friend even prefaced his PhD dissertation in microbiology with a treatise on the resemblance between the behaviour of subatomic particles and the Lurianic concept of tsimtsum – the contraction of God in the process of creation. Interestingly, my friend's dissertation advisor, a Nobel-prize winner, could trace his lineage to the 16th-century kabbalist Rabbi Isaac Luria.

I felt that the real challenge to Judaism was to be found not in the sciences but in the humanities – in the study of other systems of thought, perhaps most strongly in literature, with its call to imagine wildly and widely, its invitation to experience life through others intensely different from oneself, its demand to suspend disbelief, its imperative to let go of one's own habits and culture long enough to enter sympathetically into other possibilities.

Science could be answered on its own terms, duelled with logic and ultimately, bested. Or it could be kept in its place, compartmentalized, relegated to the lab but not taken home.

But literature seduces. It finds the places of our most secret desires and shadows us wherever we go. A phrase from a poem, a moment from a novel, insidious and subversive, haunts us when we sleep and as we rise, when we are at home and when we wander.

Literature gives us schemers and nihilists, rogues and pirates, and demands that we acknowledge that we are – to use Joseph Conrad's words – their secret sharers. That is, we harbour much the same sentiments, urges, desires as those we read about.

And yet, I am struck by something fundamentally Jewish about the enterprise of literature, and its demand that we inhabit, at least momentarily, another's mind and heart. This ability to imagine lays the groundwork for empathy and for compassion, so integral to our proper treatment of the stranger, the orphan, the powerless.

Like other forms of writing, literature utilizes language. But literature has a special way of using language to express concepts that go beyond the boundaries of language. The tools of literature – symbols, parables, images, allusions – help point us to things that cannot be easily (or at all) expressed.

The idea of the Divine, for instance, defies our ability to contain it in language. But through literature, people have always found ways to approach and approximate it, and at the same time, retain a sense of its illusiveness. This is what happens, for example, in Shir Hakavod, the medieval piyyut, or liturgical poem, sung on Shabbat, known commonly by its opening words, Anim zmirot. The poet seeks metaphors to describe God, acknowledging repeatedly that he cannot really know God.

The festival of Shavuot celebrates the revelation at Sinai, a central moment for Jewish consciousness. Yet traditional biblical commentators belabour the difficulty of our ancestors with that encounter. One midrash, or interpretive commentary, imagines the impact as so fearsome that at God's first utterance, the souls of the Israelites fled their bodies. God's word returns, complaining that it has been sent to a dead people. God then sweetens the word for the Israelites, so that each hears the Divine word according to his or her capacity. I like to think of that sweetening as the literary element, an invitation to approach what cannot be fully known.

The Kirshner File

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Soon we will know whether Ehud Barak, Israel's former prime minister, can rise from the dead, metaphorically at least.

The May 28 Labor party primary will not only determine whether Barak is a better candidate than the tarnished incumbent, Defence Minister Amir Peretz, but whether he can convince the party's power brokers and delegates that he has mended his ways.

Barak, the current front-runner in the hotly disputed contest, announced his candidacy in the first week of January after what appeared to be a sincere display of contriteness.

Without delving into gritty details, he humbly admitted that he made "many mistakes" during his tenure as prime minister from 1999 to 2001, presumably referring to his abject failure to forge peace agreements with Syria and the Palestinians when these opportunities seemed so ripe for the picking.

In a slightly more expansive fashion, he conceded that his "lack of experience" as a politician had worked to his detriment, acknowledging that "there are no short cuts" in public life and that leadership is "a shared burden, not a solo mission." Barak was doubtless alluding to his widely decried arrogant style, his reluctance to consult and take good advice and his less than stellar interpersonal skills.

The most decorated soldier in the annals of the Israel Defence Forces, he earned a degree in physics and mathematics from Hebrew University and a post-graduate degree in engineering/economic systems from Stanford University. Chief of staff in the early 1990s, he then plunged into politics, serving as minister of interior and foreign minister. After wresting the Labor party leadership from Shimon Peres, he became prime minister, defeating Benjamin Netanyahu.

Barak promised to settle Israel's conflicts with the Palestinians and Syria, but fell short. Israel and Syria reached a consensus on some thorny issues, but talks eventually broke down in a welter of mutual acrimony, and a peace treaty eluded them. With the Syrian option having vanished, Barak ordered the unilateral withdrawal of the Israeli army from southern Lebanon, then turned in earnest to negotiations with the Palestinians.

At the Camp David summit in July 2000, organized and stage managed by the United States, Barak and then-Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat grappled with final status issues ranging from borders and Jewish settlements to the status of eastern Jerusalem and the problem of Palestinian refugees displaced by the 1948 and 1967 wars.

Barak offered sweeping territorial concessions within the context of a two-state solution, but his proposals, which were basically rejected by Arafat, caused the implosion of his precarious government. Barak's foreign minister resigned and his right-wing coalition partners deserted him. Within two months of the collapse of the summit, the second Palestinian uprising erupted, undermining what remained of the Oslo peace process.

In a last ditch effort to salvage Oslo, Israel conducted talks with the Palestinians at Taba. But Sharon abandoned these negotiations after his landslide victory over Barak in 2001. Benjamin Ben-Eliezer replaced Barak as party leader and Barak went into business, spending substantial time in the United States. While Barak was abroad, Ben-Eliezer was supplanted by Amram Mitzna, a former army general who was ridiculed for his advocacy of a unilateral pullout from the Gaza Strip.

When Mitzna stepped down, Peres took his place. Shortly afterward, Barak announced his intention to regain the party's leadership. Barak's initiative was scorned by many of his former colleagues, including Ben-Eliezer. As a result, Barak dropped out of the race and left the field to Peres. In rapid succession, he turned his attention to the private sector once again, divorced his wife, Nava, and took up with a new woman.

Peres lost his position to Peretz, the trade union leader, in 2005. Peretz joined Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's coalition as a junior partner, while Peres defected to Olmert's centre-right Kadima party.

When Peretz's popularity rating crashed following last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon, Barak launched a bid to recapture the Labor party leadership. Several important party members endorsed Barak, notably Matan Vilnai (a general who was once passed over for chief of staff), Ben-Eliezer, Shalom Simhon (a former cabinet minister) and Isaac Herzog, a current minister.

Barak initially justified his candidacy on the grounds that the IDF, in the wake of the second war in Lebanon, was in dire need of reform, and that he had the "experience" and "maturity" to implement these changes in the capacity as the next defence minister. Peretz, having essentially failed in that pivotal job, said recently that he now aspires to be finance minister in Olmert's government.

But since the release of the Winograd Commission report, which castigated the performance of Olmert and his colleagues during the war, Barak has switched course.

Bowing to the dictates of public opinion and common sense, he declared that he would not serve in a government headed by Olmert. Two of Barak's leadership rivals, Ami Ayalon, a former Shin Bet director and navy commander, and Ophir Pines-Paz, a onetime minister, had already urged the party to leave Olmert's government. Labor party Secretary-General Eitan Cabel voiced an identical message after the Winograd Commission findings were released, tendering his resignation as a minister in Olmert's cabinet.

Now that it seems clear that Barak's short-term objective is to remain in opposition, should he win the party leadership next week, all eyes will focus on his policy positions.

At the Camp David summit, whose collapse he squarely blamed on Arafat, Barak was reasonably flexible and even visionary.

He was ready for a groundbreaking deal in which Israel would relinquish about 92 per cent of the West Bank and all of the Gaza Strip. The Palestinians would then establish a demilitarized state. In exchange for annexing eight per cent of the West Bank, containing three major settlement blocs and 80 per cent of the settlers, Barak would compensate the Palestinians through land swaps.

Barak was prepared to allow the Palestinians to set up a capital in Arab neighbourhoods of eastern Jerusalem. Conversely, Israel would retain areas where Jews formed a majority of the population. As for the Old City, sovereignty would be shared.

The Palestinian refugee issue would be resolved through the patriation of Palestinians to the new Palestinian state. There would be no "right of return," though family reunions would be permitted within certain limitations.

Seven years on, Barak hews to the same principles, believing that what was proposed at Camp David is still valid today. "You will need a magnifying glass to identify the differences between what was on the table in 2000 and what will ultimately happen," he told an American journalist two years ago.

Barak, like Sharon after him, is of the view that Israel must disengage from the Palestinians and finish the security barrier so that two separates states – Israel and Palestine – can emerge. Without a two-state solution, he argues, Israel will be unable to sustain itself as a Jewish and democratic state. Barak's rivals, Peretz, Ayalon and Pines-Paz, hold very similar views.

The days are gone when the Labor party could have its cake and eat it – retain the bulk of the territories and maintain Israel's Jewish identity.

New thinking presented to leading supporters

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

Dramatically different programs based on big ideas. That's the objective of UJA Federation this year – a goal articulated last week to the organization's leading donors attending UJA's Top Gifts Dinner, by 2008 annual campaign chairs, Morris Perlis and Lesley Binstock Offman.

Perlis categorized Toronto's Jewish community as "large, caring and growing" but a community facing serious issues in a dangerous world – issues that cannot be tackled through "healthy, yet limited yearly growth."

Among the concerns flagged by Perlis are the alienation of young people toward Jewish life, intermarriage and nurturing future Jewish leaders.

"As a community, we have no reason to believe that we will be shielded from the decline many American Jewish communities are already experiencing, but unlike many of them we are in a position to do something about it," said Perlis. "We are in the process of designing dramatically different programs, based on big ideas, in order to deal with some of our most fundamental issues."

Specifically, Perlis cited the need for new programs to capture the "incredible passion and exuberance" of birthright israel participants once they return home; increased Jewish school enrolment and a first-time initiative to guarantee every Jewish child the opportunity to attend a Jewish summer camp.

Lesley Binstock Offman, reflecting on a recent mission to Israel reported that, "because of last summer's war, social programs [in Israel] are yet again going through dramatic reductions," as security costs climb. UJA Federation, she added, has to help fill the social welfare void.

"We learned that we are not doing this alone," she said. "More and more, we are identifying partners in Israel – successful Israeli philanthropists and other not-for-profit organizations - that believe in what we are accomplishing and want to partner with us."

UJA Federation, noted Binstock Offman, is concentrating its assistance to Israel on "those who are living in the most peripheral areas of the country," such as the northern border, communities close to Gaza and the southern Eilat-Eilot region.

She spoke enthusiastically about post-army youth volunteers, belonging to the Ayalim program, who volunteer with underprivileged children. She also sadly described her visit to Sderot, on the Gaza border, which has been bombarded by 4,000 rockets since the Israel disengagement from Gaza in 2005.

"Imagine driving through a town of 24,000 people and barely seeing one lone soul in the streets because children and families are living in a state of ongoing terror," she said.

UJA Federation Women's Campaign and Advocacy chair Liora Yakubowicz noted the growth of women's gifts from $2.5 million ten years ago to $9.3 million last year, which represented more than 11% of the campaign total.

Last year's UJA Federation campaign, chaired by Ariella Rohringer and Fred Waks, raised $81 million, which included $20 million for Israel's emergency needs, following and during last summer's war with Hezbollah. Harvey Frisch is returning as the vice-chair for the upcoming Campaign 2008.

The Top Gifts dinner, sponsored by CIBC World Markets, was chaired by Shanitha Kachan and Alan Menkes.

Weiss family inspires Torontonians with their story

By SHOSHANA POZNANSKY
UJA FEDERATION

Surviving Hurricane Katrina in 2005 taught the Weiss family about what really matters in life. Brooke and Brian Weiss from New Orleans, who recently briefed UJA Federation on their experiences, travelled to Toronto with their three young daughters to be honoured by Hillel of Greater Toronto for the work they are doing to help others rebuild their lives.

Over this past winter break, approximately twenty Toronto Hillel students travelled to New Orleans where they volunteered with the Weiss family, rebuilding the homes of other victims.

Before Hurricane Katrina struck, the Weiss family had already evacuated twice due to hurricane warnings. "This was the third evacuation of the summer," says Brooke. "I packed the car with two days worth of clothing as I had done before, as well as a box full of photos and my ketuba (Jewish marriage contract)."

The family relocated to Jackson, Mississippi, while Brian - a New Orleans police officer - stayed behind.

When Brooke and her daughters reached Jackson, she realized that her bank card did not work. With no access to money and a husband working under dangerous conditions, Brooke needed help. Jackson's Jewish community was the first to come through. Within days, New Orleans' Jews were each given $700 cash, collected by United Jewish Communities (UJC), the umbrella organization of North American Jewish Federations. With this money, Brooke was able to rent a one-bedroom apartment and put a deposit down on furniture for her family.

"Growing up in the Jewish community, we learn how to give tzedaka, but we don't learn how to accept it," says Brooke. "I made a promise to myself that when my family got back on its feet, we would find a way to repay the community."

Brian continued to work in New Orleans for six months, seeing his family only for a few days at a time. Six months after Katrina, the family reunited and is currently living in a two bedroom apartment back in New Orleans.

Of the 12,000 Jews living in New Orleans before the hurricane, only 5,000 have returned. Since the hurricane, Brooke and Brian have welcomed another addition into their family.

"When I found out Brooke was pregnant, I felt we were doing our part to help repopulate the Jewish community in New Orleans," says Brian.

To help others, Brooke and Brian have started a non-profit organization - Project Starfish - which is working to help clean up Jewish homes affected by the hurricane and raise money to support the police department.

"No matter how difficult things are, we would not go back to pre-Katrina days, because now we really know what is important in life, our family, friends and community," notes Brooke. "There is something unique about feeling supported by Jewish communities everywhere, helping both Jews and non-Jews alike."

Toronto's own Jewish community – through UJA Federation raised over $260,000 for relief to victims of Katrina, a portion of which was allocated to IsraAid, an Israeli relief and humanitarian organization which sent Israeli workers to help evacuate citizens. Heart-felt story stirs leading UJA Federation supporters

Lebanese-born Brigitte Gabriel keynote speaker at organization dinner

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

Calling Islamic radicalism "today's greatest great threat to Western civilization," author and lecturer Brigitte Gabriel called on the world to stand together against "Islamo-fascism." As the founder of a non-profit organization, American Congress for Truth.org, dedicated to exposing the dangers of Islamic extremism, Gabriel practices what she preaches.

Of all active Islamic terrorist organizations, Hamas "has the largest infrastructure on American soil," she told UJA Federation's leading donors last week.

Gabriel, a Lebanese Christian, who lived in Israel before moving to the United States, described her childhood as a victim of a Muslim bombing campaign. After a bomb left her buried underneath her demolished south Lebanese home, she was hospitalized, she said, for two and a half months and then spent seven years inside a bomb shelter.

"I learned how to peel thorns with my tender young fingers in order to eat the plants underneath," she said.

During that perilous period of her life, Gabriel credits Israel for keeping her family alive by entering south Lebanon to protect its Christian population.

After her mother was seriously wounded, Gabriel dodged danger to get her mom across the border to an Israeli hospital, where she eventually spent 22 days.

"To my mother it was a life saving experience. To me, it was a life-changing experience," said Gabriel. "The doctors treated everyone. They did not see religion…they did not see political affiliation."

Gabriel described September 11, 2001 –when terrorists attacked New York's World Trade Centre – as the day on which "the world woke up" to "connect the dots" between the danger faced by Israel and the danger faced by the entire world.

Proclaiming herself as someone who wears Zionism as a "badge of honour on her forehead," Gabriel urged her listeners to focus their attention on Israel, which, she said, should be "our number one goal."

Gift ensures a musical future for TanenbaumCHAT

By JONATHAN AIN
UJA FEDERATION

When Sharon and Howard Meyer were first sending their children to CHAT (Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto) in the late 1990s, they were struck by the school's impressive record in math, science and Bible studies. One area they felt was missing was a significant music program.

Now a decade later, the Meyers have stepped up with an extremely generous gift to what is now TanenbaumCHAT, ensuring that all students in our community – especially those with an interest in the arts - will be able to benefit from the school's respected academic curriculum without sacrificing their dedication to music.

"We realized there were actually kids choosing not to go to CHAT because they were very musically oriented," explains Sharon. "The parents had to say, 'look, as much as I love the day school system, I have to find a place where my son or daughter can continue to develop their musical talents.' That was one of the main drives for this gift."

A portion of the gift is going towards building the new, state-of-the-art music room at the Kimel Family Education Centre on the Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan. There, the northern branch of TanenbaumCHAT, is set to open this September.

The Lebovic Jewish Community Campus is an initiative of UJA Federation's Tomorrow Campaign, chaired by Gerald Schwartz and Lawrence Tanenbaum.

The bulk of the money is going towards endowing the music program at both the Lebovic site as well as the existing TanenbaumCHAT branch on Wilmington Avenue.

"Music is a very expensive program to run," says TanenbaumCHAT director of education Paul Shaviv. "Over the last ten years we've radically expanded the drama and fine arts programs, but music could not be fit in either in terms of space or budget. Now, Sharon, Howard, and Sharon's father, the late Michael Finkelstein, have really enabled us to have an incredible music program as well, and one that is truly sustainable into the future."

Although the Meyers hope that their generosity will inspire others to step up and contribute too, they both say the inspiration for giving must come from within.

"My father, Michael, was the person who instilled it in us," says Sharon. Howard agrees and adds, "Sharon's father really was our inspiration in endowing the programs at both Wilmington and Lebovic. He was always looking for different ways to give back to the community, and children and education were two things he always championed. But he was a quiet man, and gave from a distance. He was always focused on how he could help others, and that taught us to always look for different ways to give back."

Ve'ahavta volunteers tutor Regent Park kids

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Newcomers Homework Club, an after-school program for immigrant children living in Regent Park, helps students get better grades and integrate into a new land.

Most of the program's volunteers are from Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee, with some from Frontier College, a national volunteer literacy organization.

The club's volunteers come from all walks of life, ranging in age from 12 to 80.

Last week, The CJN attended a session of the homework club at Regent Park Duke of York Public School.

Volunteer Vivian Rakoff, 79, former director of the Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (formerly the Clarke Institute of Psychiatry), was tutoring his eager 12-year-old Somali charge, Ayub Mohamed.

> 'It's amazing we can bring so many cultures together'

Rakoff, the picture of patience and grandfatherly tolerance, walked Mohamed through a series of mathematical problems. At first shy and retreating, Mohamed's voice soon got steadier and more confident as Rakoff praised him with each correct answer.

"You're really very good at this," Rakoff offered.

"Oh yeah?" Mohamed asked in disbelief, traces of a proud smile on his lips.

"Yeah," countered Rakoff, sporting a huge grin.

Similar scenes played out across four classrooms, with tutors and students not only learning from textbooks but also from each other.

Sarah Zelcer and Ambaro Gouled, Regent Park Community Health Centre representative.

The Newcomers Homework Club, which runs twice a week for two hours, accepts students aged six to 17, accommodating upward of 50 participants. And demand has grown so much that there is a perpetual waiting list.

Ken Martin and Stephen Hong, volunteers from Frontier College, said they both learned as much as, or more than the kids they help.

"I think it's amazing we can bring so many cultures together to make this happen," Martin said, pointing to the diversity of participants in his bright classroom, filled with books, pictures and learning tools.

Amina Ware has two sons who are enrolled in the homework club. Ware, 39, immigrated to Canada from Ethiopia in the mid-'90s.

"We ran, travelling from country to country to here," she said. "And when you talk to people here you get help and you feel comfortable.

Sarah Zelcer, Ve'ahavta's director of international programs, said the club, started by the Toronto District School Board (TDSB) 13 years ago, originally served Regent Park's predominantly immigrant Somali community. However, it's morphed over the years to accommodate the changing face of Regent Park and now serves a variety of cultures.

"The interfaith component happens through interaction," said Zelcer. "But there are a number of ways we try to engage both the tutors and the learners with each other's cultures."

Zelcer noted that specific, yearly cultural exchanges in the Newcomers Homework Club include acknowledging and celebrating holidays like Eid, the Islamic holiday that marks the end of Ramadan, and Chanukah.

"And at the end of the year, we have a big Somali feast," she said.

The club is supported by donations from individuals and organizations and receives funding from the TDSB and the Regent Park Community Health Centre, which helps to pay for the rental of classroom space.

Diabetes fails to hold scholarship students back

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Jody Grundman, Elizabeth Kagedan and Frances Sher are among 36 Ontario teens who were awarded $2,500 scholarships last week from the Diabetes Hope Foundation at a ceremony held at the University of Toronto.

Jody Grundman

The foundation, which has given out 181 scholarships, was established in 1999 by Barbara Pasternak, a mother of three sons, two of whom have diabetes. In addition to providing financial assistance to offset medical costs for needy families, the organization provides scholarships to students graduating from high school who have excelled at managing their diabetes, shown academic achievement and participated in sports and their communities.

Grundman, 18, says diabetes has never kept her from doing anything, although it was "definitely hard at the beginning."

However, within a month of her diagnosis at age nine, she was giving herself insulin shots, and just a few months later, she attended sleepover camp as planned. She has written for her school newspaper at the Anne & Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and played on its volleyball, basketball and rugby teams. She has also taught swimming, tennis and skiing and played on local Toronto softball and hockey teams.

Elizabeth Kagedan

Now she is planning to go away to university and study science, with the goal of becoming a doctor.

Probably the most challenging part of having diabetes is that "you can never really stop taking care of it," Grundman said. Her teammates and coaches have been very understanding, she added.

"I'm very open about it… If I have to leave the practice and go get a juice [because of low blood sugar], they're very understanding."

Frances Sher

For her, the scholarship underscores the fact that "diabetes isn't all that I am. I'm an athlete. I'm a student. I'm involved in student government."

Kagedan, a 17-year-old native of Ottawa who has been diabetic for more than 10 years, is excited about entering university and hopes to major in economics and political science before pursuing a graduate degree in journalism.

In addition to looking after her diabetes – "I'm so used to it," she said matter-of-factly – Kagedan, a student at Lisgar Collegiate Institute, has undergone "really intense surgery" for an unrelated condition called osteofibrous dysplasia that manifested in her case as tumours in the bone of one leg. The surgery included the insertion of a steel plate and screws, and was followed by "lots" of physiotherapy.

"It really puts things in perspective," said Kagedan, referring not only to the condition, but also to the experience of seeing other patients in the hospital who have worse problems.

Now, she bikes to school and has taken up yoga. She is at the top of her class, and is also involved with her school's drama program.

For young people who are newly diagnosed with diabetes, Kagedan advises that "it's really easy to be scared – and rightfully – but it's important to remember, especially if you're young, that you're not in it by yourself. Other people are there, and they're willing to help."

Technology, including the insulin pump she uses, means that "you don't need to sacrifice the normal lifestyle too, too much."

In fact, Kagedan likes to think she would be incorporating many of the aspects of a diabetic lifestyle even if she didn't have to, such as exercising and watching her diet.

Sher, like Grundman, wants to become a doctor. Since the fall, the Thornhill Secondary School student has been volunteering at York Central Hospital in the pharmacy, maternity and surgery units. She hopes to specialize in pediatrics, and plans to study science or health science next year.

The 17-year-old, who was diagnosed during her first week of high school, recalls that it was challenging to have to focus on her diet, insulin and blood sugar levels at a time when she and her fellow students were just starting to make new friends.

But her new friends were very supportive, she said. She is used to being asked a lot of questions about diabetes and said she is happy to educate people about it.

"Knowing that there's [the Diabetes Hope Foundation] scholarship gave me motivation that… I'm on the right track," said Sher, who teaches swimming and was part of her school's track and field team, fashion show and nutrition action committee.

Having diabetes can be hard in the beginning, she said, but "it really becomes a part of your life… It doesn't restrict me from anything."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

We must look within ourselves

By RABBI TINA GRIMBERG

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

Pirkei Avot, one of the most beloved Jewish collections of writing, is traditionally read in synagogues between Passover and Shavuot. The book poses provoking and timeless questions, and assists us with valuable ideas about human ambitions.

In order to teach us, the text uses questions and answers, including the following: Who is wise? The one who learns from everyone… Who is powerful? The one who masters his desires… Who is rich? The one who is content with his lot, who respects other people.

A thirst for power, wealth and respect has continued to plague humanity throughout centuries of human experience, and the dilemmas resulting from these desires have transcended historical periods and cultures.

A short story called The Necklace, written by Guy De Maupassant as a criticism of 19th-century French society, tells of a beautiful young woman from a poor family who wishes to be someone she is not. The wealth and comforts of aristocracy lure Matilda to dream of a fantasy world where, among plush cushions and expensive china, she entertains important guests. When she returns to reality – her shabby apartment, modest dress and middle class husband – she feels sadness and resentment.

The story rises to a climax when the couple is offered a chance to attend an elegant ball. They spend their modest savings on a beautiful dress for Matilda, and as a final touch, she borrows a diamond necklace from a wealthy friend. Delirious from her success in creating the perfect image for herself, she dances and celebrates throughout the night. However, upon their return home, she discovers that the borrowed diamond necklace has been lost. In order to replace it, the couple sell their belongings, borrow money from their modest family and work for years to pay off their debts. Years later, a tired and aged Matilda encounters the old friend from whom she borrowed the necklace. In a frank exchange that often takes place among people who have nothing to lose, Matilda discloses the saga of replacing that diamond necklace, only to learn from her friend that the original was fake.

Maupassant points the reader to the timeless lessons that our Jewish tradition has captured in its ancient ethical teachings, written ages before his time. Matilda, though physically beautiful on the outside, is greedy, selfish and, like her diamonds, a fake. It is not enough that her family savings are spent on a beautiful dress for the ball, but jewelry her friend originally offers her does not satisfy Matilda, and from among a more impressive selection, she chooses the fatal, fake diamond necklace. She is not capable of controlling her hunger for riches and reaches for the impossible. Matilda wants to be honoured by society, but at the same time, she scorns her hard-working husband for earning a modest salary.

The heroine of the story is not really poor in her middle class financial situation, but because she perceives herself as inferior to others, she overlooks the many gifts that lie all around her: she is healthy, her husband is devoted and loving to her, she can actually afford to have the assistance of a maid and therefore has the luxury of free time, and she can even attend the theatre.

Matilda is not alone in her world, yet she chooses the solitary path of dreaming her life away. Her gaze is never turned to examine the world within her or the world beyond material things.

Pirkei Avot teaches us to respond to the eternal human quest for power, wealth and honour by acting with self-control, appreciation of others and the ability to listen and learn. Taken to heart, its message leads us towards life filled with meaning and genuine joy.

A parental partnership with God

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

In an upcoming Torah portion, God instructs Moses to have Aaron bless the people of Israel with the words that will become known as the Priestly Blessing. The translation that we are most familiar with states the blessing as: "May God bless you and keep you. May God shine His Countenance upon you and grant you mercy. May God lift His Countenance onto you and grant you peace."

They are beautiful and powerful words whose impact is felt much more strongly in the Hebrew when these words could equally be translated without the word "may." In other words, these blessings are an invocation of what God will do rather than what God might do.

Certainly, only a kohen, a priest, or a High Priest could speak so forcefully about God. Only someone of high religious authority could invoke God's blessing and protection in such a demanding way.

And yet, these are the very words Jewish parents have used to bless their children every Shabbat. With the hands of the parent upon the head of each child, these strong statements are made of how God will bless, guard, interact with and bring peace to our children. How can a parent speak in so demanding a way? Perhaps we are better off saying "May God" do these things rather than insinuating the statements without the "may."

But the Talmud and many parallel documents within Jewish texts empower each parent to speak forcefully and demandingly when blessing our children. The Talmud states that every person has three parents responsible for their creation. The mother and the father provide the body, and God provides the soul. To complete any baby, any person, there must be an intimate relationship of parenting between the mother, the father and God.

There are several places within the Talmud and midrash that speak of God's pain, as it were, when there is human suffering. It is the description of a parent suffering along with the child. A midrash explains why God appears to Moses from a burning thornbush. It's the image of the thorns that the midrash stresses. While Israel is suffering in Egypt, God will communicate through images that speak of pain, thorns. A talmudic section in Brachot describes God's tears and the impact of those tears on the world. The universe itself feels the impact of two Divine tears.

Another midrash describes how the parent does not want to share their pain with the child. The midrash quotes a verse from Jeremiah that states: "So that you will not hear it, My Soul shall weep in secret."

Every parent understands that few things can affect us in the most secret places of our soul the way that a child can.

We ourselves acknowledge this strong parenting relationship God has with us when we sing Avinu Malkeinu, "our Parent, our Ruler." We are forever the child in that relationship, until we ourselves create a child together with God. Now we parent along with God and we are empowered to speak the words of the High Priest.

Every Friday night, with our hands upon the heads of our children, we speak to them as parents and invoke the third parent, God, into the sphere of protecting our children. We speak forcefully with the words of the Torah. "Yivarechecha…" I do not say "may God bless you," but rather "I, as a parent, am now speaking with God, as a parent, and I am clearly stating that I need You to do this. It is not a request, it is a clear communication."

We speak the words of the Priestly Blessing from the Torah portion as we draw our children to us, and, in essence, we say to God: "When I cannot be there to protect them, You must shield them. When I cannot soften the world for them, You must extend Divine Mercy. When I cannot be with them, You must draw near to them and bring them peace. I say this to You as one parent to another, for we created this child together."

A treasure trove of Jewish history

By ALEX GROPPER

Past
Forward

The Cairo Genizah was one of those little-known discoveries of important manuscripts that have had a major impact on Jewish studies and scholarship.

Discovered a little more than 100 years ago, its contents have been overshadowed by the more spectacular Dead Sea Scrolls, which have captivated the popular imagination for 60 years. The scrolls have a more widespread appeal because they cast light on the period, from the second century BCE to the first century CE, that gave birth to Christianity as well as to normative Judaism, whereas the documents from the Cairo Genizah date from 1,000 years later. (Interestingly, the genizah contained a document known as the Damascus Covenant, which turned up among the manuscripts found at Qumran, the home of the scrolls, more than 50 years later.)

As with other major discoveries discussed in this column, it was locals who first brought the material to the attention of the outside world. At first, Europeans noticed something new in the Cairo antiquities market. It was thanks primarily to the efforts of two sisters, Agnes Smith Lewis and Margaret Dunlop Gibson, residents of Cambridge, that the renowned university there obtained the bulk of the collection.

This was indeed quite fortuitous, since they brought the material to the attention of the man who would be forever associated with the Genizah documents, the redoubtable and legendary Rabbi Solomon Schecter, who at that time was the reader in talmudic and rabbinic literature and keeper of the collection of Hebrew manuscripts at Cambridge.

Fortunately, Rabbi Schecter was probably the one man in the world who would be able to fully appreciate and analyze the material. One of the first documents he came across was the Wisdom of Ben Sira, popularly known as Ecclesiasticus, which he published. His study of the material is still a landmark of scholarship.

But Rabbi Schecter realized he would have to go to the source, to the genizah of the Ben Ezra synagogue itself. What he found there astounded both him and the world. It contained more than 100,000 documents, which have since given us a unique and unparalleled look into a prominent Jewish community of 1,000 years ago.

It turned out that the Genizah included not only sacred material, but also letters, some of a very personal nature. As well, the documents have given us an unprecedented view of the dealings of the Jewish community with its neighbours, who were predominantly Arab and Muslim, but it also shows that Jews there had contacts as far afield as Spain. In fact, among the documents found was a handwritten draft of the famous Guide to the Perplexed from the author himself, the great Maimonides, who by this time resided in Cairo.

The Cairo Genizah has received a strong Canadian connection in the last few decades. The documents were found in the genizah, or book repository, of the Ben Ezra Synagogue in the Fostat district of what is now Old Cairo in 1896. The Canadian Centre for Architecture of Montreal and its director, Phyllis Lambert, was recently responsible for the restoration of the synagogue. In 1999, the Albert Friedberg Genizah Project, made possible by a generous grant from the Toronto philanthropist and businessman Albert Friedberg, has undertaken the major task of cataloguing and digitizing the collection so that it will be instantly available to scholars around the world.

Prof. Jim Diamond, chair of Jewish studies at the University of Waterloo, heads the project. Diamond is an outstanding scholar and a man of many talents. Prior to his present position, he was a practising lawyer who decided to devote himself to his love of scholarship and went back to university to get his PhD. Waterloo was quick to recognize his ability and appointed him to chair its newly created Jewish studies department. Diamond and I, in my capacity as president of the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, have been discussing the possibility of organizing a major international conference in Toronto on the Cairo Genizah that would bring some of the top genizah scholars in the world to the city and would be open to the public.

The Six Day War, Part 3

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Golan. Gaza. Sinai. The West Bank. The redrawing of the map after those Six Days in June has stirred passions and challenges that have lasted for four decades. But none have been as deeply felt and far-reaching as the unification of Jerusalem in 1967.

Back then, Yossi Ronen was a rookie reporter for Israel army radio. While veteran journalists found themselves covering the south during the war, it was left to Ronen to get to Jerusalem to follow the Israeli forces as they made their way through the narrow streets of the Old City. Ronen describes the moment as he and Rabbi Shlomo Goren, then chief rabbi of the Israel Defence Forces, neared the Kotel. "Goren did not stop blowing the shofar and reciting prayers. His enthusiasm infected the soldiers, and from every direction came cries of 'amen!' The paratroopers burst out into song, and I forgot my role as 'objective reporter' and joined them in Jerusalem of Gold." [http://tinyurl.com/2a8lhq] You can listen to Ronen's report online in Hebrew. The IsraCast website also supplies a full English transcript of the broadcast so that you can follow along. [http://tinyurl.com/23a4ej]

Abraham Rabinovitch, now a veteran Jerusalem Post reporter, had just arrived in Israel and was covering the crisis for an American paper. He recalls "the day he walked past deserted Israeli and Jordanian checkpoints to enter the Old City for the first time." [http://tinyurl.com/2gx65v]

Paratrooper Avraham Schechter writes: "Was I dreaming?… I woke up and saw the Kotel. I came close, and starting praying… I felt someone was listening to my prayer up there… Friends told me I cried like a child. I wrote home on a piece of scrap paper that I envied no one – I was in the unit that broke into the Old City and got to the Kotel." [http://tinyurl.com/2bswqh]

When he was interviewed on the 36th anniversary of the war, Teddy Kollek wasn't rhapsodic about the war and its legacy. In 1967, Kollek had been mayor of Jerusalem for just more than a year and was concerned about what he saw. "I felt this was too big a victory. I had very nebulous ideas about it, but it was clear this kind of victory wouldn't bring us only good… I think the '67 was a disaster because it changed our ego – it made us so certain of everything, so absolutely…" Arrogant, Kollek is asked. "Yes." [http://tinyurl.com/25lhrk]

Recently, the Guardian spoke to nine people – soldiers, students and journalists, Jews and Arabs – who had witnessed the Six Day War. Nazmi Al Jubeh was a 12-year-old Palestinian schoolboy living in the Old City at the time. "After four days of curfew our family set off for home. We walked down the steps towards the Maghrebi Quarter [the community that abutted the Western Wall] and there was nothing there. Just piles of rubble and bulldozers at work with Israeli soldiers dancing on the ruins. I just wanted to know where all my friends had gone." (The Guardian also has fascinating wartime recollections of Yael Dayan and Uri Geller – yes that Uri Geller.) [http://tinyurl.com/3788oa]

Some images of the war have been seared into our collective memory: Rabbi Goren blowing the shofar at the Kotel; Moshe Dayan, Yitzhak Rabin and Uzi Narkiss entering the Old City with the Lion's Gate behind them. You can view those pictures online [http://tinyurl.com/2eqfzh] as well as many other lesser-known photos of the war. [http://tinyurl.com/243hwq]

But I would venture to say that the iconic photograph of the Six Day War, taken by David Rubinger, is the one of three IDF paratroopers gazing upward – the middle one with his helmet cradled in his hands – dwarfed by the Western Wall. There is a site where you can listen to Rubinger talk about events surrounding that photo. Most of the recording focuses on how it became so famous through an accident of fate. Shortly after Rubinger took the shot, the photo was widely distributed and used without his permission. Rubinger saw his photo in an unauthorized book and used by news services – sometimes with a mistaken credit. At first Rubinger was furious, but then he had a change of heart. "Because it was so widely stolen and used, I have to be eternally grateful to all those thieves. They made it famous," he said. [http://tinyurl.com/235pf2]

Record enrolment expected for next year

In all, the school expects to have about 1,520 students next year, of whom about 600 will be at the northern branch. There will be a combined enrolment of more than 450 incoming Grade 9 students at the two branches.

It's too early to know whether there will be an increase in applications for tuition assistance, Shaviv said.

Gila Martow, a mother of four and an activist for government funding of faith-based schools, said she was "shocked" by the increase. "People have to realize tuition is going up much higher than the cost of living… I'm afraid the bubble's going to burst and we're going to start to see schools closing," said the optometrist, who receives no tuition subsidies and has one child at CHAT and two younger children in day school.

"If I had a kid today starting out in first grade, I would think twice about starting at such a high rate, knowing the increases are so tremendously large," said Karen Bookman, whose daughter Rebeca will enter her final year at Tanenbaum-CHAT next fall. Bookman said she is unhappy about the increase, but "it's just one more year."

At Ulpanat Orot and Yeshivat Or Chaim – respectively the girls' and boys' branches of the Bnei Akiva High Schools – tuition has not yet been set for next year. However, under a funding agreement with UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the school, which charged the same tuition as CHAT for the 2006-07 year has "no option but to charge whatever CHAT fees are, unless we can demonstrate that our per capita costs are lower than CHAT," said principal Frank Samuels.

Private high school fees in Toronto can run as high as $26,175 per year for the final two years for day students at Upper Canada College, although tuition at University of Toronto Schools is less, at $15,000, plus a yearly percentage increase, according to the schools' websites. Tuition at Bishop Strachan School is $22,450 (plus a laptop fee of more than $2,500), and $19,515 at Havergal College.

RECESS SCRABBLE

Bialik Hebrew Day School has introduced a Recess Scrabble Club for students in grades 3 to 5. Robin Pollock Daniel, a Scrabble champion and Bialik parent, taught the students how to play the game and created such excitement that the school is going to extend the program to grades 6 and 7. With their Scrabble boards, clockwise from left, are Jaron Szpindel, Abbey Kalan, Noah Chapnick, Adam Levin and Josh Finkelstein.

BB lodge celebrates 40 years

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

The song We Are Family appropriately describes the members of B'nai Brith Canada's Forestdale Heights Lodge.

Known for their warmth and caring for each other, and for their mission to serve the community wherever help is needed, the members have kept their lodge full of enthusiasm for four decades.

On Sunday, May 27, Forestdale Heights Lodge will celebrate its 40th anniversary with members and friends at a gala dinner at Beth Radom Synagogue.

Forestdale Heights Lodge was founded in 1967 as a men's service lodge. Some 20 years ago, members recognized the need to attract more volunteers and opened its membership to women. It now has about 70 members.

Bonnie Kates, president of Forestdale Heights

Bonnie Kates, who teaches medical courses in the health care industry, is the lodge's 31st president and the first woman to hold the position.

"We have lived up to our motto, 'People Helping People,'" she told The CJN.

She said that although there are more men than women in the lodge, "we are anxious to attract more couples and we are pleased to welcome people who have moved to Toronto."

In a joint interview, Bonnie, her husband Michael Kates, and Nate Salter, both past presidents, reflected on the lodge's many accomplishments and activities.

"Whenever we were asked to take part in any community volunteer project, our lodge was there with people power to execute an event, and often, with a cheque for funds," Bonnie said.

"We did our fair share of burger flipping, marshalling walkers, sprinters and runners on behalf of Terry Fox, Rick Hanson, and the United Jewish Appeal. We took kids in wheelchairs to hockey games, basketball, baseball, bowling and events at the zoo," she added.

"We purchased a handicapped equipped bus for a children's residence, been involved with telethons and the Jerusalem Pavilion at Caravan, and we continue to pride ourselves on being hands-on volunteers in the multicultural fabric of the greater Toronto community."

Said Salter, "You can make a difference and change the world by just getting involved."

He spoke of programs such as Purim parties and megillah readings for seniors, taking Reena clients to Toronto Blue Jays games, helping Zareinu, and numerous other services to the community.

Michael said that along with Forestdale's primary focus on volunteer services, there are many social aspects to the lodge and an opportunity to make and meet new friends.

"There are so many innovative services our lodge participates in," Bonnie said. "As an example, we provided tutors for some developmentally challenged young men and made them a bar mitzvah with a Sunday brunch for their guests."

The lodge holds monthly dinner meetings with a variety of topical speakers.

"All our meetings are under kashrut supervision," she said, "because we want to keep it open for everyone."

She added that the members range in age from the late 40s "and up."

Salter, who was the lodge's president in 1977-78, says that if people want to get involved, "there is plenty to keep them busy."

"Our lodge was revitalized five years ago when another lodge wanted to amalgamate with Forestdale Heights. We found that the other lodge was much more focused on social. So the shidduch didn't work out," Bonnie said.

"But it gave us an opportunity to re-examine and rediscover ourselves and to recognize our strengths and our focus on volunteer community services along with our extended family social activities. It strengthened us."

Centenarian a physical fitness buff

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

For 100 years, Ruth (Rivka) Unger lived her life as many women of her generation did.

She came to Canada early in the century, worked in a factory on a sewing machine, married, had children and coped with the tragedies that life meted out.

Ruth Unger

At her 100th birthday party, surrounded by family and friends, Unger was feted as a woman of outstanding strength and courage. She is known for her joie de vivre and her love of life and people.

With amazing clarity for every detail, the centenarian recalled her life at an interview at Forest Hill Place, where she has lived for three years.

"She is my hero," says Unger's niece, Joan Kirsh. "She's endured much sadness in her life, and yet she still experiences great joy in little everyday things, like a tiny new shoot on a plant or a smile on a baby's face."

Ruth Krakauer was born in Klimintov, Poland on May 20, 1907. At 21, she was brought to Toronto by her father's brother, Louis Krakauer, and she lived on Henry Street with her aunts and uncles.

"I went to work at Line Shirts," recalls Unger. "I made collars and sewed them into the shirts."

Six weeks after arriving in Canada, she met Morris Unger, who had come from Stashov, Poland. Two years later, they married and moved into two rooms on Robert Street. Morris worked as a driver for a laundry company. They had two daughters, Anne and Bernice.

When World War II ended, Ruth found out that her mother had died of a natural cause, but her younger sister and father, along with many other members of her family, had perished in the Holocaust.

While raising her family, she helped her husband, who owned a shvitz (steambath) at Spadina Avenue and Nassau Street and later a movie house called The Gay at Parliament and Dundas streets.

Speaking of the sadness in her life, she noted that her husband died in 1991, the same day her brother died. One of her daughters, Bernice (Bunny) Friedman, died of cancer and her other daughter, Anne Chapman, has Parkinson's disease.

But despite the sadness in her life, Ruth is known for her glowing smile and her positive outlook on life. A physical fitness buff, she continues to take an exercise class each morning and says that she goes down to the gym to work out in the afternoon.

"I love to walk. I walk every day but I don't have as much strength as I had last year," she jests, "but I am OK. I use a walker when I go outside and I still go shopping."

When asked what were the most important events in her life, she replied, "Firstly, all my family – children, grandchildren and great-grandchildren – when Israel became an independent state in 1948, and the end of the Second World War."

Kirsh says, "I was always impressed with Auntie Rivka's ability to cook, bake, sew, knit, crochet, garden, and she did everything so well.

"She really blew me away one day many years ago when we were driving in her car and the muffler fell off. Undeterred, there was Auntie Rivka, under the car, refastening the muffler with bits of string and a nylon stocking. And off we went.

"Resourceful and self-reliant, finding practical ways to fix, adjust and improve things around her – she finds a use for everything."

The secret to Unger's bright outlook on life, despite so many losses, is her ability to be satisfied with everything. "If it's not 100 per cent," Unger says, "I say it will be better the next time. And I was lucky that I never felt jealous of what anyone else had.

"I never really had time to feel sorry for myself because it was never important to me what someone else had – I was grateful and satisfied with what I had."

Palestinian infighting could ensnare Israel

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

As of this writing, renewed factional fighting in Gaza from May 13 to 16, had claimed two dozen Palestinian lives, and wounded many more. Much media attention focused on the violent events and weakening political situation.

On May 14, Palestinian Authority Interior Minister Hani al-Qawasneh resigned, saying that he had not been given the authority to stop the infighting. This made an already difficult situation even more uncertain and chaotic.

On May 15, Hamas launched a mortar and rocket attack on a Fatah-controlled base near the Karni crossing into Israel, killing eight members of the Presidential Guard, loyal to PA President Mahmoud Abbas. Hamas claimed that an Israeli tank shell was responsible – a charge even Fatah ignored, while Israel issued an official denial.

Indeed, Israel has been trying to steer clear of involvement in the internal Palestinian strife, but it found itself closer to responding after Qassam rockets again struck the town of Sderot, injuring four people, one seriously.

As CTV's Janice Mackey Frayer said in her May 15 report, the violent instability "threatens to pull Israel into the latest Palestinian infighting at a time when the Israeli government has avoided its own military operation. And so the stakes are rising."

Meanwhile, there is still no word on the fate of the BBC's Gaza-based correspondent Alan Johnston, abducted two months ago. Although journalists have been frequently snatched off Gaza streets, prior to Johnston, all were released within hours. Now, foreign correspondents have abandoned Gaza, meaning a dearth of information is coming directly from the area.

BBC correspondent Aleem Maqbool is reporting from Ramallah, in the West Bank. On May 15, he said many experts believe the continued fighting could cause the unity Palestinian government to fall. However, Maqbool said, "ordinary Palestinians are questioning whether the government's collapse will necessarily make the situation worse." He concluded: "For now, talk of a unity government and ceasefires seems empty – it is guns and bullets that are doing the talking."

Several Middle East analysts noted that Israel can take no comfort from the fighting and chaos. If the PA collapses, in the absence of a peace agreement between the Palestinians and Israel, international law (according to several experts) requires Israel to take responsibility for the well-being of the Palestinians in the territories. So even after unilaterally withdrawing from Gaza in August 2005, Israel might be required to police Gaza – something it obviously wants to avoid.

Some Israelis believe the continued infighting in Gaza is part of Hamas's grand strategy. In "Reality Overtakes the Illusion of Unity in Gaza" (New York Times, May 16), Steven Erlanger quotes Gidi Grinstein of the Reut Institute, an independent research group in Tel Aviv, "who argues that [f]or Hamas… peace is a disaster because it solidifies and recognizes Israel, so the key is to prolong the occupation." And the way to bring this about is to make it as difficult as possible for Israel to extricate itself from the territories so that a two-state solution might ultimately emerge – precisely what Hamas violently opposes.

Erlanger also analyses reports that, in an effort to forestall the turmoil from Gaza spreading to the West Bank and farther east, destabilizing the Hashemite Kingdom, Jordan might consider a form of "stewardship, but not sovereignty, over the West Bank."

Erlanger writes: "King Abdullah II [of Jordan] has been calling for talks to solve the Israeli-Palestinian problem in the face of the Islamist challenge. But he also appears to believe that Israel has no reason to withdraw from the West Bank, let alone make peace, unless the Palestinians put their house in order."

Demand for Israeli arms on the rise

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israeli arms sales are expected to increase over the next few years, says Yair Shamir, the chair of Israel Aerospace Industries (IAI), Israel's largest manufacturer of military equipment.

Demand for sophisticated Israeli weaponry is growing because it is reliable and has been battle tested, said Shamir in an interview during a brief visit to Toronto.

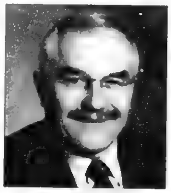
A former Israeli Air Force pilot and an electrical engineer by profession, he said that sales would be 10 times higher if the Arab-Israeli conflict could be resolved.

Even so, IAI, which was known as Israel Aircraft Industries Ltd. until recently, is riding the crest of a boom. Sales last year hit $2.8 billion (US), of which $1.8 billion was in defence-related products, while the rest was in commercial aerospace technology. Fifteen per cent of its sales are to the Israel Defence Force.

Sales in 2007 will top the $3 billion mark, disclosed Shamir, who bears a strong resemblance to his father, Yitzhak Shamir, who served as both Israel's prime minister and foreign minister.

IAI, with 16,000 employees, sells to more than 80 countries, including India, Turkey and Canada, and accounts for about half of Israel's defence exports. Shamir, however, declined to discuss further details, saying, "I don't want to embarrass our customers."

By all accounts, Israel's defence exports reached almost $4 billion in 2005, making Israel one of the leaders in the field. Israel's exports reportedly account for at least 10 per cent of the global trade in military goods. In 2004, Amos Yaron, the then director general of the ministry of defence, told a Knesset committee that 80 per cent of Israel's military production is exported.



Yair Shamir

IAI, which is 100 per cent government-owned, manufactures a wide array of systems for military and civilian use.

Its military products run the gamut from the Arrow missile and the Phalcon air surveillance system to the Green Pine radar system and the Ofek spy satellite. Also rolling off IAI assembly lines are the Barak sea-to-sea missile and unmanned aerial vehicles such as the Harpy, Scout and Searcher.

Canada has purchased unmanned vehicles, or drones, but Shamir said, "Canada is not a big market for us."

As well, IAI produces command, control, communication and intelligence systems, telemetry and airborne instrumentation equipment and patrol boats. In addition, it refurbishes and upgrades combat aircraft and helicopters.

On the civilian side, IAI manufactures business jets, notably the Astra and Westwind series.

In Israel, IAI's chief competitors are Elbit, Rafael and Israel Military Industries.

Shamir said that IAI sales must be approved by the Israeli government. IAI must seek the approval of the U.S. government when IAI systems contain American components. Nor can IAI sell to countries classified by the Americans as enemies.

Several years ago, Washington forced Israel to scrap the sale of a Phalcon system to China after the United States expressed concerns that it might be used against its Asian ally, Taiwan, which is claimed by China.

Shamir regrets that that his company had to cancel the Lavi jet fighter program in 1987. "I thought it was a mistake," Ironically, the project was abandoned by his father, who cited budgetary constraints.

In theory, Shamir thinks that Israel should not be dependent on overseas military suppliers. But he doubts whether Israel can afford to be totally independent and still provide for the educational and social welfare needs of its population.

He also voiced regret that the Nautilus anti-rocket system, for which IAI provided components, was scrapped due to soaring costs. If the Nautilus had been properly deployed, it might have positively affected the outcome of last summer's war in Lebanon, during which Hezbollah fired thousands of missiles at Israel.

Asked whether Israel can defend itself against the threat of short-range missiles, he replied, "Israel has the capability of stopping such missiles." The question is whether such a system would be cost effective, he noted.

According to Shamir, the current barrage of Qassam missiles fired from the Gaza Strip by Palestinian militants presents Israel with a more difficult challenge. "The problem is that these rockets are in the air less than a minute. There is a technical solution, but it may not be cost effective. You'll go bankrupt in no time."

Nevertheless, IAI and Rafael are currently working to develop a missile shield to deter Qassams. He does not know when it will be ready.

He claimed that the Arrow, which has been repeatedly tested and refined, is fully operational and could intercept a shower of Iranian surface-to-surface Shihab-3 missiles.

At present, the Arrow is manufactured in the United States under licence. Pending approval by Israel and the United States, Shamir hopes to sell the technology to other foreign buyers.

Shamir described Iran as a "strategic threat" whose budding nuclear program can be dealt with through espionage and a combination of military, diplomatic and economic means. "There is no insoluble problem," he said, adding that European and American pressure on Iran could be helpful to Israel.

He is convinced that Israel and Hezbollah will fight a second round. "But the end result will be different. We've learned from our mistakes. It will be a different battlefield."

A hawk whose political sympathies lie with the Likud, Shamir opposes the resumption of talks with Syria, claiming that the Syrians are not really interested in peace. "They're playing games." Nor would he be willing to to pay the price of a peace treaty with Syria: a full withdrawal from the Golan Heights.

Shamir, too, would oppose further Israeli withdrawals from the West Bank or Palestinian statehood. "The Jewish people are the owners of Judea and Samaria." Besides, the Palestinians have not reconciled themselves to Israel's existence and seek its destruction by piecemeal means, he said. Yet Shamir suggested that Palestinian statehood may be a foregone conclusion. As he put it, "The train has left the station."

Shamir, who headed El Al Airlines from 2004 to 2005, arrived in Toronto from the United States to raise funds for Catalyst Investments, which develops high-performance video conferencing systems.

Shamir, who is Catalyst's chair and managing partner, said that Israel's high-tech sector is thriving once again, though in leaner form, after the bubble burst six years ago.

High-tech products nowadays comprise nearly 50 per cent of Israel's exports, he observed, saying that the future looks exceedingly bright.

Bylaw to make CJC 'dynamic, new institution'

The joint presidency is a compromise and will likely avert a heated plenary in Ottawa on June 17, when delegates are to meet to elect officers and consider a contentious bylaw that is designed to update Congress' governance and structure.

Bylaw 67 is designed to improve Congress in areas such as organization of the executive and boards, setting the budget and implementing policy. The proposed structure would put an end to national CJC elections and see the president and senior officers appointed by a board consisting of nominees from the the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which will appoint one-quarter of the board, and from federations in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and appointees from Congress' regional offices.

Speaking prior to the talks over the joint presidency, Rabbi Bulka said the bylaw does include "representational strength, but for the people down in the trenches, the amcha, you can't be the voice of the Jewish people if there is no election."

He said one of his concerns was that the slate of candidates advanced by the nominations committee "had no Congress roots."

At the time he suggested the plenary could see counter-amendments "to allow for an election process" or conditional acceptance of the bylaw.

Negotiations to address Rabbi Bulka's concerns were ongoing last week. The talks appeared to bear fruit with the agreement on the joint presidency and the move to establish three new vice-presidents.

Rabbi Bulka, a longstanding Congress activist, announced he now supported Bylaw 67, saying it provides "the governance bridge to a dynamic new institution that will allow us to have maximum flexibility in addressing advocacy challenges of the 21st century facing the Jewish community."

Abitbol was unavailable for comment last week, but prior to the suggestion of a joint presidency, he told The CJN concerns about a lack of democracy in the proposed new structure were overblown, particularly when you consider how the bylaws, if implemented, will make Congress more efficient and effective.

The former head of Federation CJA in Montreal, Abitbol welcomed Bylaw 67. It is similar to bylaws employed by other Jewish organizations and would give the leadership the best tools to achieve goals, he said.

The current organizational structure of Congress is inefficient and poorly designed, he said in a telephone interview.

Congress, he pointed out, is "many years old, so some of the bylaws and governance may not be adequate for today's organization."

(A summary of the draft bylaw made available by Congress states that in its current configuration, the organization has "too many layers of governance in [an] antiquated model.")

Abitbol said, "We have to look at it in terms of measuring success and to be successful, you need the proper structure."

Opposition to the change is "the natural reaction of people reluctant to change. You can't manage by having committees of 75 people or when people come once in a while," he said, referring to the current Congress structure.

The Montreal federation was successful only when its bylaws permitted it to put in place the right people, set priorities, make the right decisions and implement them, he said.

The draft bylaw has been widely circulated and comments welcomed, said Steven Shulman, regional director for Congress' Ontario wing and national general counsel.

The bylaw is intended to "assure better clarity, accountability, effectiveness of Congress' governance," he said. Congress wanted "buy-in from the key constituencies and it not be polarizing."

However, one close observer of Congress had a contrary view and said he believes the bylaw is designed to centralize control of the organization in the hands of large Jewish organizations.

"CIJA is stacking the deck," the observer said. Its goal is to "take over Congress and get Congress' name and rid it of the democratic process to keep out people.

"I believe this bylaw is a further attempt to have Congress become more accountable to the federations and for the centralization of power than it is to be a spokesman for amcha, the everyman Jew," the observer, who asked to remain anonymous, said.

The observer said the suggestion of a joint presidency occurred when it became clear Rabbi Bulka and an alternate slate of candidates might win at the plenary. However, he suggested a joint presidency would be "unwieldy. How do you serve two masters, particularly on issues that need to be dealt with quickly?"

The insider suggested if anybody can make it work, it would be Rabbi Bulka. "He'll build bridges and seek consensus."

Canada, Israel hold talks in Ottawa

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Senior officials of Israel's and Canada's foreign affairs branches met in Ottawa last week to discuss political, economic, security and defence matters.

Israeli embassy spokesperson Ofir Gendelman declined to reveal details of the 2½ days of meetings, saying only that the contacts were "cordial and warm" and touched on many areas of mutual interest.

Aaron Abromovich, director general of Israel's Foreign Ministry, and Leonard Edwards, Canada's deputy foreign minister, led the talks, which are held annually.

"The aim was to strengthen bilateral ties and expand them," Gendelman said. "The idea was to bring about bilateral relations to a new level, to reflect the close relationship between the two countries.

"The situation in the broader Middle East was discussed, [along with] the Palestinians and the Iranian nuclear threat and other security issues."

Gendelman said there was "a keen interest on both sides to promote research and development," particularly in the field of technology, as well as to create a bilateral business council. Expansion of trade was also discussed, and "we talked about the possibility of allowing Israeli and Canadian youth to work in both countries for one year."

In addition, the talks addressed joint aid projects that would assist developing African countries.

Gendelman acknowledged that representatives from each country's defence and public security establishments participated in the talks, but he gave no details. "Some of the topics were sensitive," he said.

Next year's meeting will be in Jerusalem.

אַ מעשׂהלע לכבוד שבועות

V-E Day event honours Jewish WWII vets

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VICTORIA — On May 8, the 62nd anniversary of the end of the war in Europe, some 200 people gathered at Victoria's Congregation Emanu-El to honour Jewish veterans of World War II living on Vancouver Island.

Among them were 80 high school students, at least 20 veterans and members of the Jewish community. They came for a VE-Day program that included a musical presentation, an address by B.C. Lieut.-Gov. Iona Campagnolo and by one of the Jewish veterans, as well as an opportunity to see an exhibit of wartime memorabilia donated by the Jewish veterans and their families.

The event was the result of the tireless work of Janna Ginsberg, one of the congregation members.

Two years ago, she happened to be visiting Calgary at the time that the Jewish Veterans' Lounge was opening, and her eye fell on a volume titled Book of Remembrance, which listed the names of the Jewish veterans who fought in wars of the 20th century.

"I looked for my father's name and found his and those of my uncles," Ginsberg recalled. "I realized that this was a very important book, and I thought that people in Victoria should see it."

From that realization, the idea of honouring Jewish veterans of the war living on Vancouver Island germinated, along with Valour & Duty, a book that pays tribute to their heroism.

Ginsberg began by placing postings in local papers seeking Jewish veterans, and she made contact with several. She raised $6,000 from local donations, found a publisher and set to work.

"This may be the last opportunity for people to connect to these veterans, who are in their 80s and 90s now," she said.

Ginsberg connected with the University of Victoria's Oral History Project and was able to record interviews with Jewish veterans, 14 of which were included in the book, each one highlighted on a double page with images.

Creating Valour & Duty was an exercise in co-operation, one in which all the puzzle pieces fitted together naturally.

For example, Ginsberg located a graphic designer who agreed to do the graphics, logo and design work for the book free of charge.

"His name is Joe Hedges and though he's in his 30s, he has a love of World War II. He gave up his fee for the graphic design work and did this for us on the house," she said.

Five hundred copies of Valour & Duty were printed, and many of them were handed out at the May 8 ceremony.

Also in attendance at the VE-Day event was Victoria Mayor Alan Lowe, who declared May 8 to be "Honouring Jewish Veterans of World War II Day" in Victoria.

THAT'S ENTERTAINMENT: Kitty Cohen, 94, who dances with the Bubbies and Zaidies, a singing, dancing and comedy troupe for seniors, shows off some of her moves. For the past 20 years, the Bubbies and Zaidies, directed by Arye Rothman, has entertained at local nursing and retirement homes in the Toronto area. Musical director Tom Weiss says members range in age from 65 to 94, and the troupe welcomes new members. They serve as role models to their audiences, Weiss says, "because people see it's never too late to start a 'show-business career.' " Aspiring members willing to practise weekly at Earl Bales Community Centre and perform twice a month can call Weiss at 416-663-7085 or Rothman at 647-218-2468. [Carolyn Blackman photos]

SOL KANEE ז"ל - OBITUARY NOTICE

Sol Kanee died peacefully at his home in Winnipeg on April 22, 2007 at the age of 97. Dubbed "Citizen Kanee" in a tribute article by the Winnipeg Free Press and "An Exemplary Citizen" by Ernest Sirluck, President of the University of Manitoba upon conferring an Honorary Doctorate, Sol Kanee led a remarkable life and left an extraordinary legacy that will touch generations to come.

He was born Soloman, the eldest of four siblings on June 1, 1909 in Melville, Saskatchewan to Sam and Rose Kanee. Moving with his family to Winnipeg in 1914, Sol graduated from St. John's High School, received a BA from the University of Manitoba in 1929 and entered the Manitoba Law School that same year. While at university he became a passionate and skilled member of the University Honor Society and the A.ZA. debating team and won many local, national and international contests with his two closest colleagues, Max Cohen and Sam Freedman. In addition he commenced a lifelong activity in Liberal Party politics and Jewish organizations.

Graduating with a Bachelor of Law from the University of Saskatchewan in 1932, he opened a practice in Melville and rejoined his family who had moved back earlier. On April 9, 1935 he married his lifelong love, Florence Barish.

At the outbreak of World War II he enlisted in an officer's training program, was promoted to Captain in 1942, stationed in England, and promoted to Major in 1943. He served as Artillery Battalion Commander at Canadian Military Headquarters in London until the end of the war. Invited to continue his military service at a higher rank he decided to return to Winnipeg and resume his law practice with Shinbane, Dorfman and Kanee.

With the death of his father in 1951, he left the practice to take over the Soo Line Milling Company founded by his father in 1939. In 1955 he converted the mill from conveyer belt to pneumatic drive, the first mill in the hemisphere to do so and to this day the standard for the industry.

Among his innumerable public service accomplishments are 17 years on the Board of Governors of the Bank of Canada, the longest sitting member in the bank's history, and Chairman of the Federal Business Development Bank from 1975 to 1978. For the city of Winnipeg he was Chairman of the Community Welfare Planning Council, the Society for Crippled Children and Adults, the United Way, the Royal Winnipeg Ballet, for which he was instrumental in gaining its international reputation, the Board of Governors of the University of Manitoba (of which he was chair) and the Sharon Home where he followed in the footsteps of his father and brother Abe.

Sol Kanee's involvement with Jewish affairs spanned the local, national and international spheres. Under the mentorship of Samuel Bronfman, Sol rose through the ranks of the Canadian Jewish Congress to become president from 1971 to 1974. Under the mentorship of Nahum Goldman he assumed executive positions with the World Jewish Congress.

A passionate friend to and advocate for the state of Israel, in 1951 he persuaded C. D. Howe to not only sell arms but at reduced prices to Israel and later procured planes and cargo to supply relief to the young country. On the international scene, his was an important voice in securing reparations from Germany and in persuading the Russian government to ease its restriction on Russian Jews emigrating to Israel.

The recipient of countless honours, Sol Kanee was awarded the Centennial of Canada Medal in 1967, an Honorary Doctor of Laws from the University of Manitoba in 1974, Officer of the Order of Canada in 1977, Companion of the Order, 1982, Canadian Jewish Congress Samuel Bronfman Medal in 1978, the International B'nai Brith Humanitarian Award in 1979, the Nahum Goldman Medal in 1995 and the Order of Manitoba in 2000.

The Winnipeg Jewish Community Council created the Sol Kanee Distinguished Service Medal in 1994, his long time friend Arthur Mauro founded the Sol Kanee Lecture on International Peace and Justice in 2002, and the Jewish Heritage Centre of Western Canada created the Sol & Florence Kanee Distinguished Lecture Series in 2004.

Sol Kanee fully embraced his father's principle that all the good that is taken from the community must be paid back in kind. Sol Kanee repaid his city, his country, and the world far in excess of his fair share. His family, his fellow citizens and Jews everywhere will always be grateful.

He will be mourned by his sister Dr. Ricky Schachter of Toronto, his son Stephen and daughter-in-law MaryAnn Kanee, of Minneapolis, nieces Bonny Druxerman (Peter) of Toronto and Susan Reeker (Merle) of St. Louis, nephews Dr. Daniel Schachter (Anya) and Robert Kanee (Judy) of Toronto, Brian Kanee of Winnipeg, and countless friends.

Sol Kanee was laid to rest at Sharrey Zedek Cemetery in Winnipeg on April 25, 2007. Pallbearers were James Carr, Sydney Halpern, Norman Humby, Robert Kanee, Hon. Richard Kroft, and Mr. Justice Guy Kroft. Honourary Pallbearers were Sheldon and Penny Bowles, Edgar Bronfman, Charles Bronfman, Harold Buchwald, Hon. Saul Cherniak, Bryan Klien, Arthur Mauro, Sister Gerarda Pura, Kathleen Richardson, Hon. Duff Roblin, Rabbi Israel Singer and W. Terry Wright.

Hillel students honoured at awards ceremony

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

More than 75 students were honoured for their contributions to Jewish student life at Hillel of Greater Toronto's annual awards night on May 10.

"From Jewish a cappella to Israel advocacy, to tzedakah work in developing nations, to high quality Jewish educational social programs, our students' passion for Jewish life shines through," said Rebecca Woods Baum, Hillel's Israel advocacy and education program co-ordinator.

Baum and program director Daniel Abramson organized and hosted the event.

"It's our annual night to honour students and their accomplishments," Abramson said. "It's pretty cool."

Usually, one student who made a significant impact in the last year receives the founding friend of campus award, said Abramson. This year, it was replaced with an award to honour the entire Tzedek Hillel program, a group that has done a significant amount of social justice work.

Awards night organizers Rebecca Woods Baum and Daniel Abramson

Michelle Lackie, director of the Weinberg Tzedek Hillel program under Hillel International, came from Washington, D.C., to speak. Lackie has taken 1,600 Jewish college students to New Orleans to help rebuild the city.

"What's so important is getting your hands dirty, because by getting your hands dirty, you actually internalize what it means," she said.

The Weiss family, whose home was destroyed in the hurricane, came from New Orleans and spoke at the awards evening, thanking Hillel students for their contribution.

Brooke Weiss

"We've really turned our Katrina experience into a positive experience," said Brooke Weiss, who was there with her husband Brian and three daughters. "As much as you love your things, they are just things."

After receiving generous help and support that enabled the Weiss' to rebuild their lives, Brooke founded Project Starfish to help restore the city, because she felt she had to give back.

She spoke about how the idea of tzedakah and giving is taught to Jewish children at a young age, but that being on the other side of the issue is very different.

"You're not taught how to receive," she said. She and her husband shared their story and spoke about the need for support that is still pressing.

Zac Kaye, Hillel of Greater Toronto's executive director, said that a main goal for next year is to connect with more Jewish students. Currently, Hillel reaches 6,000 of the 18,000 Jewish students in Toronto, he said.

The awards evening took place at the Wolfond Centre for Jewish Campus Life on the University of Toronto campus.

Singer shares her journey with depression

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

If mental illness is a taboo, post-partum depression is a greater taboo, says singer-songwriter Amy Sky.

"It is embarrassing for a radiant mother to be depressed," says Sky, who suffered from post-partum depression after the birth of her two children, now teenagers.

Sky was awarded the 2006 Centre for Addiction and Mental Health (CAMH) Courage to Come Back Award for her efforts in raising awareness about the infliction.

She has been spreading the word about post-partum depression, a biochemical hormonal upheaval that causes the brain to function in a distorted way, since revealing her struggles while performing at an Ontario Association of Mood Disorders function last year called Mad About You.

"If I was having trouble bringing information to the public, what could a private person do about it? I am a professional communicator, so I decided to jump in," said Sky at a recent lecture sponsored by the Lodzer Congregation adult education committee, chaired by Rabbi Matthew Kaufman.

The reaction from people has been one of overwhelming support and gratitude, she said. "One in five people suffer from mood disorders, but less than half present themselves for treatment. That figure is too low. Mental health issues are way more prevalent than professionals understand."

She thinks of mental health as a bike wheel, she said. "The more spokes that get knocked out, the more chance we have of being unbalanced."

When her daughter Zoe was born, she said, "I was exhausted, and I began having hallucinations and anxiety attacks. I became conscious of all the wires in my house, and I had an irrational fear that I would be electrocuted.

"My brain had split in two. One part was invested in my daughter's well-being and the other part wanted to check out."

In addition, she said, she was in constant physical discomfort. "Walking, standing and sitting was painful. The spokes in my wheel were [all] being knocked out."

This behaviour was out of keeping with her personality, she said. "I knew something was wrong, and my mother-in-law was the first person to suggest post-partum depression, but I thought 'me depressed?'"

She did consult a doctor, however, who confirmed that she had post-partum depression.

"I did not want to take anti-depressants because I was nursing, so I went back to bed and waited to feel normal again. Eventually I had more good days than bad, and life began to resume a normal rhythm."

When her son was born two years later, she said, she had a mild relapse of post-partum depression, and in 2000 she had a third bout of depression for which she did take anti-depressants. "They were like a magic bullet. Along with a complementary course of anxiety management and cognitive therapy, I was lifted out of my depression, and I was anxiety free. I was amazed. I realized that there is a whole other way of living day to day.

"Even after weaning myself off the anti-depressants, I continue to use the strategies I learned. Good nutrition, nutrition supplements and exercise have been my greatest allies.

"Once a person has a depressive episode, they are always a candidate for a relapse. Depression is a cancer of the soul – it needs to be treated with care."

It is essential for new mothers to have non-judgmental and informed support in the delicate period following birth, said Sky.

"The post-partum period is complemented by hormonal changes and lifestyle changes, and every woman is at risk."

Sky played her song I Will Take Care of You that came out before she went public with her depression. "I made a veiled reference to my depression in the first verse when the mother said to her child, "I'm just as scared as you."

She dreams of the day, she said, when it will not be distasteful to talk about a mood disorder. "I hope that by sharing my journey [I will motivate] anyone to seek help as they would seek help for a physical condition."

ICRF fundraiser planned for May 29

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Philanthropist and businessman Andrew Faas, noted Hospital for Sick Children leukemia researcher Dr. Melvin Freedman and longtime Israel Cancer Research Fund supporters Vera and Larry Finkelstein will be the honorees at the ICRF's Gala 2007.

The event will be held May 29 at the Sheraton Centre, and popular singer Chantal Kreviazuk will give a special guest performance.

Both Faas and Freedman were humble about receiving the awards, but they said they recognize their significance.

"While I am uncomfortable with this [the award and all the publicity around it], what gives me comfort is the knowledge that my story may inspire others to do what they can to help others," Faas said.

In 2005, he was diagnosed with chronic myelogenous leukemia. He survived because of Eli Canaani, an Israeli molecular biologist who was instrumental in discovering the "Philadelphia chromosome," which is responsible for activating a cancer-causing protein.

Canaani's research was sponsored by the ICRF.

Subsequent scientific research resulted in the development of the drug Gleevec, which specifically blocks the Philadelphia chromosome on a molecular level.

Freedman, who confessed to feeling "grateful and very, very flattered" about receiving the award, said that "the support of Israeli cancer researchers is pivotal to advances in leukemia treatment."

For instance, he said, "In the late 1960s, lymphoblastic leukemia was a fatal disease. In 2007, up to 90 per cent of children are cured."

This could only have happened, because of "sustained, productive research year after year, decade after decade," added Freedman, a professor emeritus in SickKids' department of pediatrics.

The ICRF was founded in Montreal in 1975. In 1979, the Finkelsteins began the Toronto chapter.

Both Larry and Vera Finkelstein have been on the board ever since and have remained very active: Larry built the financial and electronic infrastructure of the organization, and Vera has served on many committees, both locally and internationally.

The ICRF describes itself as a major "source of private funds for innovative cancer research in Israel."

It has contributed more than $33 million (US) to more than 1,600 research grants involving major hospitals, universities and cancer research projects.

Police prepare for possible Qassam strike on Ashkelon

By HAIM BIOR and MIJAL GRINBERG
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

ASHKELON — The southern district police commander said last Friday that police were taking steps to prepare for a Qassam strike on the southern city of Ashkelon.

Commander Uri Bar-Lev said police have been placed on high alert in Ashkelon and have expanded their presence in the city and in communities near the Gaza Strip.

Three Sderot residents were lightly wounded and several people were treated for shock Friday morning when a Qassam rocket fired by Palestinian militants in Gaza hit a residential building in the Negev town.

The rocket was one of at least nine to hit the western Negev on Friday. Another rocket caused a fire in a field in Sha'ar Hanegev.

The rocket fire intensified last week, sparking an Israel Defense Forces operation in the Gaza Strip that began Thursday.

Palestinians fired some 30 rockets against Israel last Thursday, and about the same number on Tuesday. One of the rockets fired on Thursday slammed into a high school on the outskirts of Sderot, lightly wounding two people. Two others were wounded Tuesday, with one left in moderate to serious condition.

Hamas' military wing announced that it would execute anyone who tries to interfere with the rocket fire on Israel, Israel Radio reported Friday.

Opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu said Friday that Israel's government has a duty to protect the town and evacuate its citizens.

Residents of Sderot observe some of the damage to their community caused by the barrage of Qassam rockets launched at them last week by Hamas. [Israel Sun photo]

Netanyahu said the evacuation of Sderot's citizens is the job of the government, not of a tycoon. He was referring to Russian-born Israeli businessman Arcadi Gaydamak, who privately funded the evacuation of 1,600 citizens on Wednesday and their accommodation in hotels.

Netanyahu reiterated that only military measures will end the rocket attacks.

He said comprehensive military action is required to gain control of the areas in Gaza where the Qassams are being fired from, but that the government has no such long-term plan.

Asked whether he believes a ground operation in Gaza would require a continued military presence in Gaza, he said this was not a concern for him.

"There would be no reason for the IDF to stay in Gaza, just as they didn't stay in south Lebanon after the Second Lebanon War," Netanyahu said.

"More pressure needs to be put on the Palestinians," he added.

The Ministry for Immigrant Absorption and local municipalities have cooperated to arrange hotel rooms for hundreds of evacuees from Sderot across the country, from Tiberias on the shores of Lake Kinneret in the north to Israel's southernmost town, Eilat.

Ten busloads of residents left Sderot on Friday and another 20 buses were scheduled to depart on Saturday evening.

Ministry director, Erez Halfon, said, "We are implementing a range of activities for Sderot residents and will provide financial aid and holidays for families and victims of shock."

Qassam fire last week caused an estimated $17 million (US) in damage to industry in Sderot and the western Negev, the Manufacturers Association of Israel said last Thursday.

Some 85 per cent of the 40 large factories operating in the western Negev are suffering from employee absences since last week's increased hostilities, according to Yehuda Segev, director general of the association.

He added that according to an association survey, 92 per cent of industrial factories in the area have reported that they are unable to hire temporary employees to replace their regular workers who have left. Twenty-five per cent of the industries have moved their offices to safer regions, and 25 per cent have also said that they have seen a drop in local orders.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert visited Sderot on Thursday and told residents that the government will stand firm and work to reduce the rocket attacks.

Olmert's spokesperson Miri Eisin said the prime minister told Sderot residents during a visit lasting several hours that "we have to stand strong" and pledged government help.

Western officials ask Israel to help Abbas fight Hamas

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Western security officials have asked Israel to give Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas the tools he needs to fight Hamas – first and foremost, the ability to pay his security services' salaries.

The request came after the security officials said forces loyal to Abbas fought well in a battle against Hamas men near the Karni crossing on May 15, contrary to reports in the Israeli media.

The officials said Abbas' loyalists showed courage and resolution in thwarting an attack by a larger, better-armed and better-trained Hamas force. They said two different forces of Abbas loyalists had co-operated to ward off the attack, despite heavy losses.

"The soldiers did as they had been trained and overcame a larger, better-equipped force, although they were from two different units, and despite the fact that the commander of one unit had been killed and the commander of the other was not in the area," one of the western officials said.

Israel's security establishment, however, is still divided over whether to help Abbas fight Hamas, with opponents arguing that Fatah has already lost in any case.

Though several Arab states have promised Abbas money, only the United Arab Emirates has delivered.

Israel Briefs

IAF strikes Hamas

A senior Israel Defence Forces official said May 18 that the military would continue attacking Hamas targets in the Gaza Strip for as long as necessary, but expressed reservations regarding an extensive ground operation at this time. At least 10 Palestinians, most of them Hamas operatives, had been killed in Israeli air strikes as of last Friday. Palestinian militants fired some 70 Qassam rockets at the western Negev last week, causing several injuries. Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni told dozens of diplomats at a briefing in Tel Aviv that Israel is not prepared to tolerate continued Qassam fire on the Negev. She said Israel attempted to advance peace by withdrawing from Gaza in 2005, but must now exert pressure on the extremists there.

OECD invites Israel

Israel is in talks to join the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development. The OECD, which fosters free-market democracies, said it had invited Israel and several other countries to enter membership talks. Israel hailed the overture as a nod to its recent economic progress. "This is a step that expresses confidence in the Israeli economy, in its strength and in its ability to develop," Prime Minister Ehud Olmert said in a statement. Negotiations are expected to take about 18 months, during which time Israel will need to bring its economic regulations in line with those of the OECD.

Plot to kill Olmert

A Palestinian employee of Doctors Without Borders is suspected of planning to assassinate Ehud Olmert. Jerusalem District Court charged the 25-year-old Gaza man with hatching a plot on the Israeli prime minister's life in collaboration with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine terrorist group.

Israel warns Ukraine

Israel's ambassador in Kiev said the activities of a Ukrainian university with a history of anti-Semitism could damage Ukrainian-Israeli relations. Zina Kalai-Kleitman urged Ukraine to curb the anti-Semitic activities of MAUP, a private business-type school that in recent years has become the major source of anti-Semitic and anti-Israeli activity and publications in Ukraine."We want only positive dynamics in Israeli-Ukrainian relations, but this unhealthy issue can have a negative influence" on relations, Kalai-Kleitman told a news conference in Kiev.

Young people 'do Jewish' their way

By ARI Y. KELMAN

Opinion

For many younger American Jews, American Jewry looks like this:

- Synagogues are for people with children. And they're generally uninspiring.
- JCCs are for people with children. And they don't have great gyms, either.
- Federations only want my money. Then they want me to be quiet.
- This Jewish organization wants to tell me how I ought to be Jewish.
- That Jewish organization wants to tell me I should be having children sooner rather than later (and with whom I should be having them).
- I can't even talk about Israel.

Whether or not this impression of American Jewry is accurate is, of course, a matter of opinion. What is not up for debate is that young American Jews who remain single later in life are responding to these perceptions with a wave of cultural and organizational creativity that American Jewry has not experienced since the early part of the 20th century. They are inventing new communal outlets and projects that reflect their individuality and commitment to living meaningful Jewish lives.

In Los Angeles, hundreds of young Jews belong to IKAR, a "community" that blends spirituality with social justice. Out of New York, Reboot publishes the quarterly literary magazine Guilt & Pleasure, building communities of readers who use articles as the basis for salons. Across North America, the music label JDub Records has built communities of fans who are drawn to the "Jewish sensibilities" of its artists.

These are just three notable examples of a movement that has been quietly gaining momentum for more than a decade.

Many traditionalists and Jews from older generations view this phenomenon as a disintegration of American Jewish life because they believe these new efforts are not serious enough to foster meaningful Jewish life.

"The music is fine," they say, "but is it enough to shoulder the burden of identity?"

Rather than concluding that these new endeavours are weak or competing versions of existing institutions, we would do better to understand them as expressing an alternative vision of what Jewish communities can look like and how they can serve the needs of their members.

A hundred years ago, young immigrants built the American Jewish infrastructure that we have today – from American Jewish centres to landsmanshaften to nightclubs and shuls. Now we are seeing smaller, more localized but no less provocative efforts by people younger than 40 to rejuvenate, engage, practise and live Jewish lives organized on their own terms.

In cities across the country, they are creating their own minyanim instead of joining synagogues. They are writing and publishing their own journals instead of just subscribing to existing ones. They are playing their own music, putting out records and producing their own concerts. They are hosting salons and movie screenings. They are involved in the creation of Jewish life that is thoughtful, popular and exists largely on the margins of mainstream Jewish organizational life.

These new endeavours do not look like their predecessors because they are responding to the perception that the offerings of synagogues, federations and JCCs are simply too narrow and do not adequately address the diverse needs of American Jews.

This translates also into practice, as the organizations typically resist anything hierarchical, denominational, exclusionary or judgmental. This resistance is partially a critique of mainstream Jewish organizations and partially an expression of deeply held beliefs in pluralism, as well as an understanding of the fluidity of identity in general.

These are some of the lessons that Steven M. Cohen and I address in The Continuity of Discontinuity, our newly published study on this phenomenon. In the study, we explore the ways in which these new organizations represent a response to institutional Jewish life by offering a variety of responses to it.

The organizations we highlight – and there are many more across the country – are the result of creative, thoughtful, dissatisfied people who had no desire to join committees, take over sisterhoods or participate in the young leadership branch of local or national communal organizations. But they understood that the landscape of Jewish life could sustain a greater diversity of organizations and experiences.

Today there is much communal anxiety over the behaviours, attitudes and activities of American Jews between 18 and 35. Members of that age cohort are not following their elders into the halls of existing institutions, a situation that could threaten these institutions.

But what we are seeing is not the loss of Jewish practice in North America. We are seeing young people who want to build something new that follows a different vision of what an institution can be and that will cater in a different way to the needs of American Jews for meaningful Jewish engagement.

In so doing they are not simply mimicking extant communal structures. They are building on the margins where people may think it strange to support ritual theatre or a salon or a record label, but where the future of Jewish life is being built.

Poll: 71% of Israelis want U.S. to strike Iran if talks fail

By ALUF BENN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Fully 71 per cent of Israelis believe that the United States should launch a military attack on Iran if diplomatic efforts fail to halt Tehran's nuclear program, according to a new poll.

The survey, commissioned by Bar-Ilan University's BESA Center and the Anti-Defamation League, found that 59 per cent of Israelis still believe the war in Iraq was justified, while 36 per cent take the opposite view.

Some 65 per cent believe that the United States is a loyal ally of Israel, with only 11 per cent saying the opposite. A slightly higher proportion, 73 per cent, described U.S. President George W. Bush as friendly. Forty-eight per cent attributed U.S. support for Israel to strategic considerations, while 30 per cent credited American Jewry and 17 per cent cited shared values and a shared democratic tradition.

Regarding America's importance to Israel, there was near consensus: 91 per cent said that close relations with the United States are vital to Israel's security. Some 51 per cent of respondents predicted that the United States will ultimately impose an agreement on Israel and the Palestinians, while 43 per cent disagreed.

Meanwhile, UN weapons inspectors say Iran has the knowledge necessary to enrich uranium.

"We believe they pretty much have the knowledge about how to enrich," Mohamed El Baradei, director of the International Atomic Energy Agency, told the New York Times last week. "From now on it is simply a question of perfecting that knowledge. People will not like to hear it, but that's a fact."

Inspectors found 1,300 centrifuges in use after a short-notice inspection at the Natanz nuclear facility on May 13. Iran insists its program is peaceful, but weapons inspectors say it's geared toward manufacturing a bomb.

Israel has long insisted that the time for international action is not when Iran actually builds a bomb, but when it masters the technology to enrich uranium that could be used to build one. The United States and others say the danger point is when Iran is close to making a bomb, which could take several more years.

Pro-Israel group launches Washington, D.C., poster campaign

Teaching Children To Hate Will Never Lead To Peace.
Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad...
Change Your Charters and Your Future
Israel Seeks A Partner For Peace.

A StandWithUs pro-Israel, Washington, D.C., subway poster.

A Washington, D.C. anti-Israel subway poster campaign launched earlier this month will not go unchallenged.

As reported in The CJN on April 26, a group called the U.S. Campaign to End the Israeli Occupation (ETO) received permission from the Washington Metropolitan Area Transit Authority (WMATA) to place posters in 20 of its subway stations.

The ETO posters advertise Israel as a "brutal military" occupier, financed by "U.S. taxpayers like you" and depict an imposing tank bearing down upon a child with a schoolbag, walking along a dirt road.

The ads started running on May 13 and last for four weeks, culminating in a June 10 rally to end "Israel's illegal military occupation" of Palestine.

In response, a Los Angeles-based, Pro-Israel advocacy group, Stand With Us (SWU), announced last week that it would run a counter-campaign using two posters "teaching Palestinian children peace instead of hate, and urging Palestinian extremists to reform."

Roz Rothstein, international director for SWU, told The CJN by phone from Los Angeles last week, "[ETO's posters] are all one-sided propaganda."

The SWU started running two counter-posters last week. They'll run concurrently in the same subway stations to "counter the misinformation" of the ETO campaign until June 11, Rothstein said.

The first poster depicts Palestinian children carrying machine guns and declares, "Teaching children to hate will never lead to peace. Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad… change your charters and your future. Israel seeks a partner for peace."

Rothstein said her organization was very concerned when they learned about the ETO campaign.

"[ETO's] intention is to demonize Israel and they're misinforming people… saying Israel is a hate- and warmonger," Rothstein said. "People don't really understand the backdrop. We wanted to make sure people understand that… Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad are training their children to kill."

SWU's second ad shows a Palestinian militant dressed in combat fatigues, carrying a gun in one hand and holding a gun-toting toddler dressed in military attire in the other.

The poster reads like a multiple choice questionnaire and asks readers to ponder whether the child will become a doctor, teacher or "terrorist," with a checkmark next to the terrorist option.

Stand With Us' website posts the charters of the PLO, Hamas and Hezbollah, highlighting each document's call for battle with Israel and lamenting their lack of peaceful content.

"Israel is not fighting children," Rothstein said in the SWU press release. "It is defending itself against extremists like Hamas, Hezbollah and Islamic Jihad whose charters call for Israel's obliteration and whose terrorist attacks target civilians, including school children and toddlers."

Jennifer Laszlo Mizrahi, president of Washington-based pro-Israel think tank, the Israel Project, told The CJN in April that her organization expected the ETO ads to have "minimum impact."

While the Israel Project did not launch a campaign of its own, last week Laszlo Mizrahi told The CJN via e-mail that her organization welcomed the SWU ads.

"While the [ETO] campaign was poorly done and did not require a response, it is always… [good] to do things to build support for Israel in America's capital," she wrote. "If we had done ads we would have focused fully on Israel's commitment to peace… [and] the StandWithUs ads do say that."

She added: "It is important to remind people around the world that Israel is dedicated to achieving peace. That's why Israel withdrew from land, such as the Sinai, Gaza and Lebanon, in the hope of achieving lasting peace."

CBS Outdoor, the New York-based firm that places in-station advertising for WMATA, at first refused to consider the ETO ad, citing them as inflammatory, but eventually relented to pressure from WMATA and the American Civil Liberties Union to comply with freedom of speech rights.

This time around, CBS Outdoor first sent the pro-Israel ads to WMATA for review before posting them in the subway.

"We had no problem getting our posters up," Rothstein said. "Whatever the problems were… they paved the way for us to put our ads up."

Pamper yourself with a full-service spa treatment

Spa Life

Since opening in February 2001, the Mandara Spa at Atlantis has become so popular that it quickly outgrew its original premises and recently opened a new facility in the popular resort Atlantis Paradise Island, in the Bahamas. The two-storey, 30,000-square-foot facility is adjacent to the hotel's Royal Towers.

The design is contemporary and Balinese in style and the décor highlights natural elements such as bamboo, wood and stone.

"Our goal here at the Mandara is to create a magnificent setting of lush gardens and mobile water that is peaceful and enjoyable," says Tammy Clarke, group supervisor for the Mandara Spa at Atlantis. "We have created this with flowing waterfalls at the entrance.

The Atlantis Paradise Island in the Bahamas

"The Mandara Spa itself originated in Bali. What we have done is bring traditions of exotic culture here to the Atlantis and with our traditional European spa therapies we have introduced natural spices, fruits and minerals indigenous to The Bahamas. We've melded them together to provide the ultimate rejuvenating experience for our guests."

The products used in the spa include Elem, the skin and body line from England; La Thérapie corrective products from France; and OPI for nails from California. For hair and barbering treatments, the stylists use Alternaits from Beverly Hills.

The Japanese Silk Booster Facial helps fine lines and wrinkles and improves elasticity. [K.Kates photos]

Services for men and women include facials, body treatments, massages, manicures, pedicures, hairstyling and barbering.

Signature treatments include the La Thérapie Hydralift Facial, an anti-aging corrective skin care treatment using galvanic stimuli and an anti-bacterial ozone wand. The Japanese Silk Booster Facial uses an actual mask made of silk impregnated with pro-collagen serums to help fine lines and wrinkles and to improve elasticity in the skin.

Packages include Cleito's Tropical Tryst, starting with the Elemis Exotic Coconut Rub and Milk Ritual Wrap, an Elemis Deep Tissue Muscle Massage, La Thérapie Hydralift Facial, and ending with the Deluxe Tropical Manicure and Pedicure.

"For the gentlemen, we have Poseidon's Awakening. It includes a Caribbean Coffee Body Scrub and a choice of the Sports Massage, Elemis Deep Tissue Muscle Massage or Swedish Massage. After the massage, we pamper the man with an Elemis Aromapure Facial and end with our Gentlemen's Manicure/Pedicure. About 25 per cent of our capture rate at the spa is men," Clarke says.

The Gentle Touch Tooth Whitening is gaining popularity at the Mandara. Clarke says it's the quickest and most cost-effective tooth whitening system available today. The treatment uses FDA approved non-toxic gel, and after the 45-minute session, your teeth can be up to four shades whiter.

"For our mature clients we have the Elemis Pro-Collagen Marine Facial. It helps with the appearance of fine lines and wrinkles. It helps with the signs of premature aging because it includes a pro-collagen booster serum. It also includes an eye treatment," Clarke says.

There are 300 employees at the Mandara Spa. There are 12 manicure and pedicure stations, four hairstylists, one master stylist and one men's barber. The new facilities include 45 lounge seats, 31 single rooms, four couples' rooms, two spa suites and one boutique service room. There is a retail boutique and display area.

Both men and women will have a "taking the water" bathing experience. Each boasts of a sauna, steam, cold plunge, hot whirlpool, Asian showers and ultra-comfortable chaise lounges.

The Atlantis has 2,900 guest accommodations, 35 restaurants, bars and lounges, and a spacious, bustling casino. A big draw is the 20 million gallons of fresh and salt water pools, lagoons, amazing water adventures, cascading waterfalls and a marine habitat. There are 50,000 live water creatures staying at the Atlantis including barracudas, piranhas and sharks.

WestJet Vacations makes it easier to get to the Mandara Spa at Atlantis offering three flights per week directly from Toronto to Nassau.

Atlantis guests wanting spa reservations should call 242-363-2000, ext. 65900, or go online to Atlantis.com or MandaraSpa.com. To book an Atlantis/WestJet package go online to www.westjet.com. For online information on travel in the Bahamas, go to www.bahamas.com.

Tikkun olam with a truck and a hose

By Abigail Bimman
CJN Intern

Adina Kaufman can honestly say she works 24 hours a day to heal the world.

The Toronto firefighter's shifts at Station 343 are 24 hours long. Off the clock, Kaufman volunteers in a number of different venues, from tutoring to giving blood platelets.

"I think that idea [of tikkun olam] factors into the way I live my life. I wouldn't say I wanted to be a firefighter with that in mind, I think that just factors into how I live and how I make my choices," Kaufman says.

The 32-year-old's choice to be a firefighter, in fact, was not always a given.

"When you're a kid you want to be a teacher, a doctor or a firefighter," says Kaufman. "These are the things you see and the things you know, and I just thought I was going to outgrow it."

Kaufman grew up in Ottawa with an older sister, two younger brothers and her parents, Gail and Ilia. The family moved to North York when she was 10.

Kaufman always excelled academically and thought that studying systems engineering and arts was a natural career path. But when she hadn't shaken the old dream midway through her studies at the University of Waterloo, she decided to pursue firefighting after graduation.

While she describes the hiring process as very competitive, with dozens of applicants being selected from thousands, Kaufman was working within two years of her initial application, though it was a bit of a nerve-racking journey.

"I felt this is really something I could fail at," Kaufman reminisces. "I'm five-foot-three with my shoes on. You don't see a lot of short women on fire trucks."

Kaufman says that most of the calls her Toronto station receives are medical calls. Fire-related calls are mainly electrical or car fires, accidental fires caused by trades like roofing and plumbing or fires caused by mistakes like leaving candles unattended, she says.

Kaufman's biggest fire was on her first-ever shift. At 1 a.m., a call came in for a fire in a semi-detached house. Kaufman vividly recalls being directed to hose the upper balcony of the house. After the captain who gave her this order left, embers started falling at her feet.

"I will always remember this moment," she says. "I was thinking I should direct this water at the embers and yet, I'd been told to spray water at this balcony. I had this entire internal struggle. It's so not my personality but during my training it was so drilled into me [to follow commands] that the last thing I wanted to do was disobey this order. And I'm standing there like an idiot with flames growing at my feet, but continuing to direct water up at the balcony."

Eventually someone noticed what was happening and told her to put out the flames, but the moment has stuck with her.

As an obvious minority member on two fronts, Kaufman says it is rarer to meet a Jewish firefighter than a female one. While the statistics are hard to pin down, she says that definitely less than five per cent of firefighters are female, and probably less than that are Jewish. She says her religion comes up in conversation regularly at work.

"Being Jewish is an important part of my identity, it's about belonging to a community that has been mine since birth and that helps to define who I am and where I fit in the greater community that I live in," she says.

"Concepts like tzedakah and tikkun olam really resonate with me. It's about believing that I am part of something greater than myself and that it is by giving of myself that I can truly live a full life."

Her outreach efforts begin at work, where she enjoys engaging in discussions about Judaism to help better people's understanding.

"I've worked with some people who have never had a close personal interaction with someone who is Jewish. Maybe they have seen a person in a dark hat walking down Bathurst Street and that's the extent of their knowledge."

But her outreach spreads far beyond the borders of the fire station. Before firefighting, she worked as a canoe trip guide with all types of youth, with programs like Outward Bound and Project Canoe, which takes at-risk youth on wilderness trips. She also tutors with the Newcomer Homework Club, volunteers with other youth programs and speaks to students about being a firefighter.

Kaufman has done impressive work with the David McAntony Gibson Foundation, a group of emergency services volunteers. She went on a mission to Cambodia with them in 2005.

"If I had a hundred Kaufmans, the world would be saved," says foundation director Rahul Singh.

Singh recalled the quick-thinking that Kaufman displayed when a little girl got run over by a truck in the chaotic, dangerous, no-man's-land between the border of Thailand and Cambodia.

He asked Kaufman to find a board to stabilize the girl, and within five minutes she managed to retrieve a plank from a crossing porter.

"That's ingenuity," he says.

In terms of her work at the Bathurst and St. Clair fire station, Kaufman says everyone is generally respectful and understanding about having a woman on board.

Kaufman shares an analogy that was given to her by an older (and shorter) inspirational female firefighter when she started working in 2002.

"She told me that when a guy gets hired in the fire department, they hand him a bag of marbles, and every time he screws up, he loses a marble. When a woman gets hired, they give her the empty bag and she has to earn every marble. But once she earns it she gets to keep it."

"It's such a great analogy and I think it applies to anyone who goes into a work environment where they are different. You have to prove to them that you do more than fit in – you belong."

Chabon's new novel disappointing, though entertaining

The Yiddish Policemen's Union by Michael Chabon, Harper Collins

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG
Special to The CJN

Michael Chabon's latest novel, an alternate history science fiction/detective tale, is a distinct and startling departure from his Pulitzer prize wining epic The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay.

And while it falls short of that masterpiece and likely will not please devoted fans of alternate history science fiction, it has its virtues nonetheless.

In Chabon's created universe, the Jewish state has been reborn, not in Israel, which was destroyed by its Arab enemies mere months after its 1948 establishment, but, in effect, in the United States, specifically in the forbidden wilds of Alaska, which was once actually proposed as a homeland for the Jews. That's where the Americans have settled millions of European Jews, rescuing them from the Holocaust, and where today, the semi-autonomous, Yiddish-speaking Federal District of Sitka is thriving.

However, Sitka is due to revert to American control by year's end, and once again Jews are facing an uncertain, possibly dangerous future. Meanwhile, hard-bitten cop Meyer Landsman is looking into the suspicious death of an Orthodox Jewish junkie whose body has been found in the same rundown hotel where Meyer lives.

He teams up with Berko Shemets, his half native-half Jewish partner and Landsman's ex-wife Bina Gelbfish, who is also his boss. The trio soon uncover a dire plot involving a secretive – and criminal – Orthodox Jewish sect and political machinations that threaten the political balance in the world.

The Yiddish Policemen's Union is, primarily, Chabon's homage to the classic 1930s and 1940s detective fiction of Dashiell Hammett and Raymond Chandler, which in turn influenced the postwar American film noir genre, a world full of shady characters whose motives are never what they seem to be, where danger lurks around every corner, and where the flawed good guys are usually up against forces beyond their control.

In that light, Chabon excels at conjuring up the dark atmosphere and mood of those novels. The problem is that he does this so well that it's difficult to accept that The Yiddish Policemen's Union is set in 2008, despite the ubiquitous presence of computers and cellphones.

Michael Chabon

The book also never quite surmounts its detective fiction clichés – you can see the outlines of the conspiracy Landsman discovers before he does – and, essentially, boxes itself into a corner by the time it reaches its conclusion. Its ending is the only one possible for the story.

Landsman, too, is a bit of an obvious type, stubborn and self-destructive, nothing we haven't read before. But the other characters, notably Berko Shemets, whose religious Orthodoxy is, to say the least, quite conflicted, and the corpulent Rebbe Heskel Shpilman, mysterious head of the Verbover Chassidim, a kosher version of the Soprano clan, are fascinating. The book also utilizes quite clever slang: beat cops are called latkes; guns are sholems, a Yiddish pun on the words peace/piece. It's also unique, of course, to filter everything that goes on in the novel through a singularly wry and fatalistic Jewish prism.

It's as science fiction that Chabon's novel fails to engage. The book is so narrowly focused on Sitka and its inhabitants that Chabon only proffers a few tantalizing tidbits from the outside (alternate) world. He informs the reader that World War Two ended in 1946 when the A-bomb was dropped on Berlin and that Marilyn Monroe married a Kennedy (presumably Bobby) and became First Lady, but that's about it. Since the Sitka residents are an insular folk and not much interested in what's happening elsewhere, Chabon's decision makes thematic sense, but it also means that his detective tropes have to carry the novel, and they don't quite do that.

The Yiddish Policemen's Union isn't nearly as complex as The Amazing Adventures of Kavalier & Clay, which successfully married a coming-of-age story, a detailed history of the early Jewish comic book creators, an elegy on the emotional ramifications of the Holocaust on European and American Jewry and even a fantasy involving the Golem. Nor does it have the subtle poignant power of The Final Solution, Chabon's touching, Holocaust-themed Sherlock Holmes tribute. It is, however, entertaining in its own modest light and, though disappointing, a timely reminder that Chabon is one writer who never repeats himself. I can't wait to see what he does next.

Jews and Shoah key themes in alternate history genre

Along with the idea of the South winning the American Civil War, science fiction speculations on the Nazis emerging victorious in World War II dominate the literary genre that's come to be known as alternate history, "what if" examinations on how history might have turned out differently.

The idea of Nazi Germany ruling the world is horrific, of course, but considering how close that reality came to be, it makes sense that science fiction writers would be interested in that provocative subject and variations thereof.

One of the earliest and best alternate history novels is Philip K. Dick's elegiac 1962 book The Man in The High Castle, where a defeated United States has been partitioned between its German and Japanese masters and where a Jewish character, Frank Frink, plays a significant role in the proceedings.

Brad Lineweaver's Moon of Ice effectively portrays an altered world where Nazi propaganda minister Joseph Goebbels' daughter, Hilda, who in real life was murdered by her parents when the Nazis faced defeat, holds the key to exposing the reality of the Final Solution.

Hitler Victorious is a collection of diverse, mostly compelling short stories on the ramifications of a Nazi victory. Christopher Priest's The Separation, an overly dense but well-written novel in which World War II ends much earlier than it did, has an absorbing sub-plot about how England rescues Europe's Jews and places them in Madagascar, once proposed as the site of a Jewish state (a variation on Michael Chabon's The Yiddish Policemen's Union, where Alaska becomes the de facto Jewish homeland).

Less successful is Harry Turtledove's flat In The Presence of Mine Enemies, which leaps forward into the 21st century, a world long ruled by the Nazi military machine, with the few surviving Jews living in secret as contemporary Marranos. The novel isn't as interesting as it sounds, nor as powerful as Turtledove's short story of the same name, which first played with the idea.

Much better are Jo Walton's recent murder mystery Farthing, where England makes peace with Nazi Germany in 1941, and Daniel J. Gidron's superb, award-winning The Severed Wing, in which neither the Russian Revolution nor the Holocaust nor World War II ever occurred, but where Jewish soldiers are routinely used as cannon fodder in endless skirmishes between Poland and Russia.

Oddly enough, when talented mainstream writers turn their pens to the subject, the novels – such as Philip Roth's The Plot Against America, wherein aviator Charles Lindbergh wins the presidency and turns the U.S. toward fascism, or Len Deighton's SS-GB and Robert Harris's Fatherland, both featuring a subjugated England – invariably tend to suffer from failures of the imagination.

Interestingly, both Roth's The Plot Against America and Walton's Farthing also postulate Canada as a haven for the Jews. Since we all know that Canada let in fewer Jews than almost any other country, that's a hard sell. Even in alternate history scenarios, speculative suppositions need to be convincingly backed up.

Jews/Arabs yuk it up at Roy Thomson Hall

By DAVID SILVERBERG
Special to The CJN

Three Jews and an Arab walk into Roy Thomson Hall.

No, it's not a corny joke, but that's a good guess, considering all four of them are comedians who will share the stage at Roy Thomson Hall on May 29.

Dubbed the Israeli-Palestinian Comedy Tour, the event features an entertaining mix of Middle East perspectives, in what is being billed as the first time Palestinian and Israeli comics have ever toured together.

"Our primary purpose is to put on a funny show," says American-born Charles Warady, on the phone from his home outside Jerusalem. "If we bring people together, if we offer a social statement, that's extra."

Warady, 51, doesn't want to turn the show into a Middle East peace mission, and he hopes audiences will enjoy certain jokes long after the show is over.

"How many people remember a politician's words after a speech? And how many people memorize a comedian's best lines?" He laughs. "I think our way is much better."

Joining Warady in Toronto – the only show they're staging in North America – are comedians Yisrael Campbell, an Orthodox Jew living in Israel; African-American convert Aaron Freeman; and Palestinian American Ray Hanania.

The blend of Jewish and non-Jewish performers has been a winning formula for a comedy group only six months old. After the success of early January shows in Jerusalem, the troupe has high hopes for North American exposure.

So why book Toronto as the first and only gig?

"Our promoter believed in us," says Hanania, a Chicago resident. "It's a taboo show, so not every city wants to get involved. That problem is typical of the problems facing the Middle East. In Chicago, some people didn't like this Palestinian-Israeli alliance, because it might make them think, 'Oh no, this peace is contagious. We might realize those two warring sides don't hate each other as much as we thought.'"

Since he announced his partnership with Jewish comedians, Hanania has already faced five cancelled shows in Chicago.

He's not about to let those producers ruin his good vibes.

"I always believed humour is very powerful in showing how human we all can be," Hanania says. "If you laugh with other people, you bond with them."

The comedians admit some of their jokes might make sensitive audiences cringe, but in a way that says, "This joke pokes fun at Israeli-Arab relations, which should be laughed at sometimes."

Hanania offers one example of his biting comedy: "I married a Jewish woman, and at my wedding, the Arab and Jewish guests were mucking around at dinner. They were arguing over who invented hummus, flicking pita and matzah at each other. There were 38 casualties, one Jew, and 37 Arabs went to the hospital. An event like this attracts attention from the news media, so the next day, the headline read: 'One Jew injured at Arab terrorist meeting.'"

The other comics deal with similar topics, but with their own flair. Freeman, a black convert to Judaism, can get a big laugh with a line about his friends' reaction to his conversion: "You trying to give an extra merit badge to a KKK sniper?"

The Israeli-Palestinian Comedy Tour has earned international media attention, but in Toronto, the tour is also attracting one special celebrity. Maya Angelou, a well-known American poet and social activist, will open the evening with introductory remarks.

"I don't know what she'll be saying," Warady says, "but I insisted her opening shouldn't be funnier than any of our acts."

Hanania is optimistic about the gig and the future of where the tour will go. He hopes to bring the troupe to the Palestinian territories for an upcoming show, but for now, he'll settle for something in between.

"We want to do an open mike show in the West Bank to find new Palestinian and Israeli voices," he says. "We know people want to get on stage, but in this political climate, they're afraid to be seen as moderates. I think comedy can change that."

The Israeli-Palestinian Comedy Tour takes place May 29, 8 p.m., at Roy Thomson Hall, 60 Simcoe St. Tickets range from $49 to $69 (including taxes) and can be purchased through www.roythomson.com or by calling 416-872-4255.

Music returns to the Sharon Temple

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

An acoustically exquisite temple, built by a 19th-century breakaway Quaker community in Sharon, Ont., will play host to five Sunday afternoon concerts this summer, starting June 3.

Patterned after King Solomon's shrine, the three-tiered Sharon Temple was built in 1832 by a sect called the Children of Peace, who believed in a Jewish messiah.

The temple, a slice of Canadiana, has been called an essential piece of architecture by the Toronto Star.

Along with numerous Christian symbols, the temple also houses a replica of the Ark of the Covenant.

Stephen Cera, new artistic director for the revived Music at Sharon series, believes concertgoers will be impressed with the sounds to be heard.

A Winnipeg-born Jew and classically-trained pianist, Cera is a former CBC producer and was the director of the Ford Centre for the Performing Arts from 1991 to 2000.

Though he's no stranger to music, he's excited about this new gig.

"I'm privileged to work in this environment – the way [the Children of Peace] incorporated so many influences from the Bible," Cera told The CJN last week. "There's a very ecumenical spirit to the place."

Cera is also enamoured with the acoustical quality of the temple.

"Hearing music there… there's a tremendous sense of magical sound quality," he said. "The history envelops you and adds to the feeling. Even the smell of the place takes you back to the 19th century."

The temple's board of directors hope that music will draw more attention to the historic site to help fund repairs and maintenance.

It's not the first time the concert series has graced the small town north of Newmarket.

The first incarnation of the series started in 1981, to celebrate the temple's 150th anniversary, and ran until 1991.

Now that Music at Sharon is back for the temple's 175th anniversary, Cera has taken special care to program shows that reflect its Canadian heritage.

Concerts will feature Canadian soloists from across the country, as well as compositions by Glenn Gould and Quebec composers André Prévost and Maya Badian, among others.

Cera said he tried to include musical aspects that reflect the country's "cultural fabric" in his programming.

"There will be French, youth, new music, jazz and more," he said. "We also included [Canadian composer] John Beckwith's Three Motets on Swan's 'China', which was played at the first Music at Sharon event in 1981."

When asked if Music at Sharon might some day feature concerts with a Jewish theme, Cera responded, "I wouldn't rule that out."

The final event on July 8, will feature the Nathaniel Dett Chorale, an ensemble dedicated to Afrocentric music and styles.

"People will be amazed when they come up to Sharon," Cera said. "It's like going back in time, yet it's still close to the city."

Tickets for the series are $45 each or $195 for all five concerts.

MOSES LIVE IS NEW CD FROM CANTOR ERIC MOSES

To mark his 10th anniversary as a cantor, Eric Moses is launching a new CD, Moses Live, featuring a collection of live recordings.

Moses and family have much to be thankful for, since his wife, Melissa, recently celebrated her 36th birthday free of cancer. Three years ago, she was diagnosed with breast cancer while pregnant with the couple's twin daughters. Moses has dedicated the CD to her and plans to donate all proceeds from its sale to assist the Weekend to End Breast Cancer.

Besides promoting the CD, Moses intends to promote vigilance against cancer, particularly amongst the Ashkenazi Jewish population, at the launch. It's at the Beth Sholom Synagogue on June 12, 8 p.m.

Israel & the Jewish World

Jews will miss Blair

By NATHAN JEFFAY
Special to The CJN

Comment

After 10 years as prime minister of Britain, Tony Blair has announced that he will step down. For Anglo-Jewry, this means the end of a very stable period and a leap into the unknown.

Generations of U.K. Jews have grown up with a deep fear of rejection by mainstream society. Under Blair, Britain's Jews have become more like Canada's, with a strong self-confidence about their place in their country.

The outgoing prime minister has held up Jewish values as examples for Britain at large. He has also surrounded himself with Jewish advisers and allies like no other premier (even leading to accusations of a "Jewish cabal"), and made his a regular face at community functions.

Tony Blair and Ehud Olmert last December in Jerusalem.

Given that to more and more citizens in this country, Jews are seen as fair bait for venting anger against Israel, Blair's friendship has proved important. It has boosted morale inside the community and sent a message to the wider society that people should replicate his respect. Anti-Semitism has increased in the last decade, but there is a feeling among Jews that Blair's pro-Jewish gestures have kept it in check.

The community also feels that as a devout Christian, Blair has understood its religious needs. Despite pressure on the government from politicians in all parties to strip faith-based schools of funding, they have not lost a penny, and Jewish education has flourished – 14 new government-funded Jewish schools have opened under Blair.

He has also acted on requests from communal leaders. They felt that everyone should be educated about the Holocaust. His government made Holocaust education compulsory for all school pupils, and instituted the annual National Holocaust Memorial Day for the whole nation. The public purse has even funded a new scheme to take two pupils from every mainstream high school on a day-trip to Auschwitz.

He has not only worked for peace in the Middle East and been a friend of Israel, but also suffered for his friendship. Ever since the start of the second intifadah in 2000, the left – Labour's traditional fan base – has been vying for Israel's blood. By last summer, the Iraq conflict had really taken its toll on Blair, and his popularity among the left was at an all-time low. A few anti-Israel words during the controversial Lebanon conflict would have curried him some much-needed favour. But he stayed firm, a move that has none of the political benefits in the United Kingdom that it does in America – there are only 300,000 Jews in a population of 60 million.

Anglo-Jewry is a well-established community. There have just been celebrations for its 350th anniversary, calculated as 3½ centuries since Oliver Cromwell readmitted Jews following their expulsion in 1290. All emphasis was on the community's acceptance.

But reading between the lines, something was still present that is not found among most North American Jews. Part of the need to emphasize how accepted British Jews are is the deep-seated fear of being rejected or marginalized.

There is usually an undercurrent of this sentiment, but one thing brings it to the fore: uncertainty. It surfaced when Blair's government was first elected. Labour had been out of power for almost 20 years, and during that time, it acquired a reputation for rhetoric that verged on anti-Semitic. But things turned out well, and the fear went into hibernation for much of Blair's time in office, leaving just a few traces.

But once again, it's back. Synagogues resound with whispers about whether Blair's likely successor, longtime Chancellor of the Exchequer Gordon Brown, will be "good for the Jews." The community doesn't fear drastic measures, but it does have concerns about life without the known quantity that it's come to depend upon.

Nathan Jeffay is a U.K. journalist who writes for the London Jewish Chronicle.

Ducks' OT win caps unblemished season

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

When the Avenue Road Ducks hockey team scored in overtime in the third and final game of the North York Hockey League's (NYHL) championship series, they proved they were perfect.

On April 12, 2007, the Avenue Road Ducks, made up of 15 nine- and 10-year-old boys, defeated Victoria Village to win the tier one NYHL (house league) minor atom championship and finish the season with an unblemished 35-0-0 record.

"To go into overtime and win to keep a perfect season record was really exciting," said Mark Segal, manager of the Ducks.

The Ducks are located in the Avenue Road and Lawrence Avenue area. The team plays once a week, either on a Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday, and practises every Sunday. To accommodate families who celebrate Shabbat, the league does not schedule games on Friday night or Saturday before sundown.

"This is a key factor in many parents' decision to let their children play at Avenue Road," said Segal about his own reason for having his son, Dan, play in the league.

Dan Segal, 10, has been the Ducks' goalie for the past three seasons. He has seen the Ducks progress from an unsuccessful tier three team in 2004-2005 to a middle of the pack club last year to this season's undefeated squad.

"It felt really good but it didn't feel real. It just didn't feel like we won every single thing," Dan said. "Everybody had a really good year. I think this was the best year in our history."

Not only did the Ducks beat the teams in their own division, but they also defeated teams from across Canada and the United States. In December 2006, the Ducks received a gold medal at the Gene Harrington Memorial tournament in Niagara Falls. They were awarded another gold in February at the Richmond Hill Stars tournament where they outmatched clubs from the Greater Toronto Area.

"We were challenged by teams that we didn't compete with during the regular season. We played against teams from America and Canada that we don't play against in the NYHL," said Jonathan Lechter, head coach of the Ducks for the past three seasons.

Lechter attributes a large part of this year's success to extended practice sessions that provided the players with an extra 40 minutes of ice time every Sunday.

"We were on the ice more, using our legs more and getting used to skating hard. I found that it helped us in our passing and moving the puck," said Adam Lechter, Jonathan's son.

The consecutive wins presented challenges to Jonathan and the team's two assistant coaches. They found it difficult to improve the kids' hockey skills because the wins did not expose their weaknesses, Jonathan said.

"To keep them motivated and to keep developing them as players and getting them to work hard in practice was the biggest challenge," he added.

The coaches tried to do silly things in the dressing room before the games to keep the kids excited.

"We bum wiggled to keep our feet moving and get pumped up," Adam recalled.

With the hockey season now over, the Ducks are looking forward to the start of next season in October.

"The idea is to try and do it again next season. We are definitely the team to beat," said Jonathan who has retired from the Ducks to avoid conflict with his younger son's hockey games.

"It's going to be harder next year because the other teams are really going to try and beat us," Adam added.

60,000-seat stadium to replace Ramat Gan facility

By MOSHE BOKER
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

RAMAT GAN — The National Stadium in Ramat Gan is to be replaced by a new, ultra-modern 60,000-seat facility, according to an announcement made last week by Gideon Brickman, head of the Sports Betting Council, and Ramat Gan Mayor Zvi Bar.

"The plans will be completed within eight months, after which the existing stadium will be demolished and a new 60,000-seat stadium will be built in its place," Brickman said. "The stadium will be one of the most magnificent in the world and will cost some NIS 800 million [$221 million US]."

The current stadium, which has 41,583 seats, is used to host the opening ceremonies of the Maccabiah Games every four years.

The Sports Betting Council will contribute some NIS 300 million ($83 million) toward the project. Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is also expected to allocate some NIS 150 million ($42 million) in state funding to it, with the Israel Football Association and the Ramat Gan Municipality making up the remainder of the sum.

A delegation will travel to Germany to examine stadiums built for last summer's World Cup before deciding on the model for the new stadium.

Avoid those fine Jewish whines

ALMOST FAMOUS
BY JACOB MEDJUCK

I once bought a book about stand-up comedy, and it said in the preface, "If you're Jewish, skip to Chapter 2."

We are very much a nation of sarcastic whiners. And as I make my way in the world, I'm finding it harder to sell a serious point. It seems the tone of my grievances amuses. The angrier I get, the heartier people laugh. I'm finding this reaction both frustrating and entirely rewarding. It's a troubling combination.

My parents are also complainers, but understandably so. It was not their fault, as they had difficult children (something they would often tell me). They also married ill-suited partners (something they would also often tell me). What troubles me is the feeling that I'm describing any pedestrian, loud and healthy traditional Jewish family.

So, when I was recently invited to join my parents in Israel for their 35th wedding anniversary, I promptly declined.

The rant I delivered began, "I will not celebrate an institution whose marital prisoners I have fought to see liberated from each other since the first broken glass. I have not seen people more deserving of new partners since the cast of L.A. Law." And somewhere in there, I dropped a clever barb about "soul mates" not "cell mates"– to which you can add your own adjectives and finish the joke.

But I'm just worn down by the complaining. Angered even.

From their example, I'd taken what I'd learned about marriage into the world and applied it to my own relationships – only to receive a sharp slap in the face. As it turns out, there might be a kinder way to treat others, and to be treated.

The lesson essentially is this: Jewish people – we're not all comics. We already receive enough hate from the planet. Compounding that in our homes by serving it to our families offers no benefit.

Perhaps your family's love is actual, but is it actualized? Would you notice how often you're actually behaving hatefully though whining and sarcasm? I don't mean to rob anyone of their emotional drugs, but I'm appreciating now that such behaviour, when unchecked, is a non-productive, passive aggressive form of disrespect. So please monitor how and how much of it you offer. Though wildly hilarious at times, it's usually just an easy out.

If you find yourself fighting in front of your children, the rule isn't "Don't do it." Instead, sit with you kids afterward and let them know that you've made up. Show them both sides. Earn the right to argue by also showing them the apology. Create a better pattern for them to emulate – and don't make them discover this process on their own. They'll eat up youthful years until they mature, die lonely, or marry lonely – and it's more than likely that they'll write about all of this when they're older, possibly humiliating you.

As my father would often say, "You kids didn't come with a manual."

And so, of my parents, I offer this: With sincerity, I admire the work that they've done raising me, my sister, and each other in couplehood. Congratulations to them on this happy 35th. I will see them in Israel for that celebration, and I'll quietly remind them that they're still on strict probation until their 36th anniversary, the celebration for which I'll insist be held at Disneyland. (I've decided we should pick at least one childhood trip to get right – and I'm making my preference known.)

For the rest of us, if you find yourself getting set to hang dirty laundry on your children, tell an airplane joke instead. I'm told there's something funny about the peanut bags – though I don't know what, as I was told to skip the chapter in the book that explained it.

1 parsnip, peeled, cut into small pieces	1/3 cup sour cream

Trim root off leek; remove tough outer leaves. Cut in half lengthwise; rinse out sand very well; pat dry with paper towels; cut into 1/4" dice. Melt butter and oil in pot over low heat. Add leek, onion, parsnip; cook, stirring, over low heat, 10 min.

Add broth & tarragon; bring to boil. Add asparagus, reduce heat to low; cover & simmer 30 min. Uncover; cool to room temperature. Puree soup with immersion blender or in regular blender. (If it seems stringy, pass it through a strainer.) If using regular blender, return to pot and stir in milk/cream; warm over low heat (do not boil). Serve soup, dolloped with sour cream.

Change is a comin'

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

If you are the type who studies people, places and things, you may be noticing the Toronto Jewish community is morphing in character. We are loosening our tie and becoming a tad more creative and soulful.

Our town has been a very conservative place since I can remember. We've focused our resources and developed our community ideology around making money, crisis-driven tzedakah, repetitive Holocaust education, anti-Semitism and the swamp-draining, sexy, sabra-picking-oranges perception of our beloved State of Israel.

Our Jewish community buildings were simple, often decorated with lacklustre antique memorabilia and black and white pictures of past presidents, chairpeople and founders. Now, this is not meant to offend those individuals who have worked arduously to ensure a strong community, but let's face it, there is little inspiring about being stared at by the president of a 1950s organization, in a black suit, and thin grey tie, with a protective smile and a small brimmed fedora propped on his very proud head.

I took a tour of the Jewish Federation building in Montreal a few years ago. They had decorated with drawings and paintings by local Jewish adults and children, essentially bringing life to the walls and a spirited essence to their Jewishness. They exhibited life. L'chaim to it.

That was not the case, however, here in Toronto.

Things are a changin', however. A new generation of leadership is a ridin' over them there Bathurst Street hills intent upon adding colours and shapes to our digs and the very soul of the community.

Today, when we enter places of prayer and organizational headquarters, we frequently come face to face with art and sculptures from local artisans. While we still draw on the old, there seems to be something more compelling about the archival material displayed in our halls; perhaps it is how the exhibits are presented and/or how the the documents and photographs are framed – or maybe the message is modern (i.e., this is the way it was, but no longer) while the pictures have remained the same. Not sure.

Now, take a look at the programming we're creating in Toronto. Baycrest just held its second hockey tournament, using NHL alumnae to raise funds ($2 million for Alzheimer's). I've noticed articles and advertisements in The CJN seeking volunteers for an organization's curling program (quite a departure from a volunteer appreciation night with guest lecturer Rachel "Middle East" Pundit).

Recently, Toronto's Jewish federation advertised a formidable all-day business event with high-profile businesspeople speaking about a multitude of ideas. It was a fancy-shmanzy day of financially successful people sharing their real gifts, as opposed to telling us party-line Jewish and Israel rhetoric that has become boring and mind-numbing.

The Toronto Jewish community has passed a very important threshold. We are far less insulated than ever before. We recognize that creativity and soul is a good thing, and that "leaving home" and joining the rest of the world has its benefits.

In that light, the progressive Out of the Cold project, a synagogue-based outreach program assisting the homeless, has now become mainstream. Ve'ahavta: the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian and Relief Committee; Young Judea; Hillel and other organizations have opened our eyes to the real meaning of "never again" and to the Jewish promise of helping others, whether they be Catholics in Argentina, Muslims in Sri Lanka or the Shona tribe in Zimbabwe.

We are now where the New York Jewish community was about 15 years ago. We have a ways to go to becoming a full-blown metropolitan and big-thinking city, but we're moving... and that is exciting and fortunate. It was getting quite boring here for awhile.

Nazi collaborators lose citizenship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The federal cabinet has revoked the citizenship of Nazi collaborators Helmut Oberlander and Jacob Fast, opening the door for their possible removal from Canada. However, one of the lawyers representing Oberlander said last week he would seek a judicial review of the cabinet decision, and promised his client will never be forced out of Canada.

The Oberlander and Fast cases have been before the cabinet for years. Both men were alleged to have served in German units during World War II and lied about their wartime activities when they obtained Canadian citizenship.

Oberlander's citizenship had been removed by the cabinet once before in 2000, but a Federal Court review of that process in 2004 overturned the revocation and instructed the cabinet to reconsider. A Federal Court found in 2003 that Fast, too, had misrepresented his wartime role as a collaborator with a Nazi security police force in Ukraine, leaving open the possibility that his citizenship would be removed.

In announcing the two revocations last week, Justice Minister Rob Nicholson stated, "Canada's new government has been clear in its support of human rights and our international obligations: Canada will not become a safe haven for anyone who has been involved in war crimes, crimes against humanity or genocide. We take these issues very seriously.

"These cases have been under consideration for a very long time. Due process was followed according to the laws of Canada; it is time to move forward," Nicholson added.

Eric Hafemann, a lawyer representing Oberlander, told the Kitchener-Waterloo Record that the cabinet

The News in Brief

CANADA

Group Gets Standing

REGINA — A Saskatchewan Court of Appeal judge last week granted intervenor status to B'nai Brith Canada in the Crown's appeal next month in the hate crimes case against native leader David Ahenakew, but he turned down Canadian Jewish Congress' request for the same status, saying its legal argument echoes that of the Crown. Ahenakew, a former head of the Assembly of First Nations, was convicted in 2005 of wilfully promoting hatred against Jews for remarks he made about Hitler to a reporter in 2002. A judge overturned the ruling on appeal and ordered a new trial, saying the trial judge didn't consider if Ahenakew intended to promote hatred. The Crown is appealing the order for a new trial, and the overturning of his conviction. Both the Crown and Congress contend the remarks to a reporter were not private, and hence fall under the Criminal Code's hate provisions.

Cotler Gets Degree

OTTAWA — MP and former justice minister Irwin Cotler was in Waltham, Mass., May 20 to receive an honorary doctorate from Brandeis University. It was the ninth honorary doctorate for Cotler, a noted human rights advocate and law professor at McGill University. Also receiving degrees were author Joyce Carol Oates, biologist Jonah Folkman and architect Daniel Libeskind.

WORLD

Rabbi Attends Funeral

CHICAGO — Rabbi Yechiel Eckstein represented the State of Israel at the May 22 funeral of U.S. televangelist Jerry Falwell. "I am honoured to represent the State of Israel at the farewell to this great man and important figure," said Rabbi Eckstein, president of the Chicago-based International Fellowship of Christians and Jews. He said Falwell was "a man that I was honoured to call a personal friend. He will be deeply missed." Falwell died May 15 at 73.

Aussie PM Honoured

MELBOURNE — Three Jewish groups honoured Australian Prime Minister John Howard for his friendship with Israel. At a May 20 dinner in Melbourne, the State Zionist Council of Victoria, the Zionist Federation of Australia and the World Zionist Organization jointly awarded Howard the Jerusalem Prize, The Age reported. A forest will be named in his honour. Howard said he received the award as a "mark of the bonds that exist between our two nations," adding that it has "been a longstanding policy of my government to see a two-state solution to the challenges of Israel's relationship with its Arab neighbours."

Zara Shatnez Apology

MADRID — A Spanish retailer has apologized to haredi Jews for selling garments that violate the prohibition of mixing wool and linen. A spokesperson for the retail giant Zara said last week that it had removed the offending men's suits from its shelves, the Guardian reported. Jewish law prohibits wearing garments made from a blend of wool and linen, known as shatnez. About 40 or 50 Israeli clients complained about the shatnez suits. Zara is the leading fashion retail chain in Israel, with 15 stores, 900 employees and $340 million (US) in annual sales. The company placed advertisements in haredi media to apologize for what it said was a production error.

Canadian Loses Appeal In Looted Art Case

SAN FRANCISCO — A U.S. appeals court has ruled against an appeal by a Hamilton man and his three South African cousins, saying that actress Elizabeth Taylor can keep a Van Gogh painting that may have been illegally seized by the Nazis from one of their relatives.

Elizabeth Taylor

The court ruled May 18 that Andrew Orkin, a lawyer and great-grandson of the German Jewish woman who once owned the painting, and his cousins had waited too long to ask for it back, Reuters reported.

"This affirms my great belief in the American judicial process; I am very grateful," Taylor said in a statement. "It's wonderful to have Monsieur Vincent Van Gogh in my living room."

Taylor, 75, bought the 1889 painting View of the Asylum and Chapel at Saint-Remy at a Sotheby's auction in London in 1963 for 92,000 British pounds, or about $257,000 (US) at the time. Descendants of Margarete Mauthner, who fled Germany for South Africa, sued Taylor in 2004, claiming the Nazis had forced the sale of the painting under duress. It's now valued at between $10 million and $15 million (US).

Taylor has maintained she bought the work in good faith and that Mauthner sold it freely.

One of Orkin's lawyers told the Globe and Mail that he may try to take the case to the U.S. Supreme Court, based on the 1998 Holocaust Victims Redress Act.

Jewish Agency studying new ways to boost aliyah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Oded Salomon is one tired guy. It's late in the day and he's been on the go for nearly a week, visiting Jewish population centres in North America. Toronto is his last stop and after flying in in the morning, he's got a plane to catch back to Israel where he'll try to figure out how to apply what he's learned about Jewish community life in New York, Chicago and Toronto to aliyah programs geared for those cities.

He's been on the job for six months as director general of the aliyah and integration department of the Jewish Agency for Israel. His North American visit was designed to get the lay of the land and learn first hand about the complicated community structure of federations and religious streams that is foreign to the average Israeli.

Oded Salomon

Toronto's reputation has preceded his visit and what he's seen confirms its distinction from nearby U.S. communities as one with "a great connection to Jewish life, Israel and Zionism," he said.

Last year, Canadians comprised more than 10 per cent of North American olim and Solomon believes "there is great potential here to increase the numbers."

Altogether 340 Canadians were among about 3,200 North Americans to move to Israel in 2006. It's a relatively small number when you consider other sources of aliyah. States of the former Soviet Union still provide the single largest number of olim, with 7,500 making the move in 2006. North America, considered as a unit, is next with 3,200 and France follows, with 3,000. About 1,400 came from all of Latin America and 750 Brits made the move – a 50 per cent jump from the year before.

Then, of course, there's the Ethiopian immigration which sees 300 Falash Mora fly to Israel each month. The Falash Mora are the Christian relatives of Ethiopian Jews already in Israel who are ineligible to immigrate under Israel's Law of Return. They are coming to Israel on family reunification programs. That aliyah is scheduled to end in 2008.

Aliyah – and devising a strategy to increase it – is a complex process, Salomon stated. In some locations, developing and enhancing a Jewish identity among the target population is the key component, though in Canada that connection already exists. Here the concern for the agency is to "know the community, its desires and needs," analyze this information "and then address messages with more focus [and be] targeted."

Once this phase is completed, "to whomever is ready and connected to Israel, we can then build programs fitted to their needs," he said.

It's a long term process for both the Jewish Agency, which is assessing its marketing efforts and to potential olim. Right now the Jewish Agency is building a strategic plan to entice potential olim. Employing terminology used in the business world, Salomon said it is expected to be "user friendly and customer-oriented rather than process-oriented." A new "interface" with olim is expected in 2008.

"Aliyah is one of the most important decisions people can make," Salomon said. "They are leaving their jobs, city and friends to go to another culture to build a new life."

Needless to say, potential olim all share a strong Jewish identity and attachment to Israel, but once a family has decided to make the move, the agency can assist greatly in integrating people to life in Israel. "People need a soft landing," he said.

Focus groups have shown that one of the biggest concerns potential olim have is finding work after they move. To address this, the agency is planning to launch in the coming months an employment centre to connect olim to employment specialists who help them find work in the areas they want, Salomon said.

Inspired by Shavuot

From the editor's desk

The holiday of Shavuot inspired me to read, listen and write about the following two items.

* * *

The Garden of Ruth, by Eva Etzioni-Halevy (Plume Books, Penguin Group, 2007), is a bold telling of the imagined life of King David's forebear, the Moabite, Ruth, whose story we read on Shavuot.

This is Etzioni-Halevy's second work of fiction. It follows upon the wide acclaim and success of The Song of Hannah, which she published two years ago. Indeed, The Garden of Ruth follows very much in the literary footsteps of Hannah, adopting similar narrative techniques and descriptive devices to relate the story of Ruth's life.

As she did in Hannah, the emeritus Bar-Ilan University scholar puts her academic skills and intellectual abilities to good use. She provides rich historical detail as a contextual backdrop to the tale that she spins. And thus, the times of which she has written play nearly as compelling a role as the people about whom she has written.

The Garden of Ruth

Ruth's life story, as fertilely imagined by Etzioni-Halevy, unfolds through two interwoven stories. The first is that of Osnath, who lived three generations after Ruth. Osnath discovers cryptic yet intriguing information concerning Ruth that inflames her imagination and motivates her to write about the famous Jewish woman.

The second story is a first-person autobiographical narrative written and hidden by Ruth herself.

The two stories mesh. In many respects, the two stories mirror each other, both in plot and in character.

The two main characters of the book, Osnath and Ruth, are both literate. They can read and write. They have piercing intellects and they are both headstrong.

Of course, depicting the character, strength and capabilities of the two women is the key purpose of Etzioni-Halevy's endeavour. She imagines them as real human beings, with all the weaknesses and frailties of the human condition. And she imagines them, much as she did the women in Hannah, as passionate and sensual.

Readers familiar with the story of Ruth and with the related events chronicled in the Bible, will immediately recognize Etzioni-Halevy's allusions to language, place and people.

But the boldness and daring with which Etzioni-Halevy imagines her characters and fills in the unknown details of their lives are an effort to bring contemporary readers closer to them.

Trying to understand our forebears' lives in terms of the feelings, pressures, convictions and dilemmas of modern life as well, the author is telling us, is simply another way of writing that the men and women of the Bible were great precisely because they, too, were imperfect human beings who were yet able to rise above their imperfections to leave the legacy that shaped our lives thousands of years later.

Readers who enjoyed The Song of Hannah, will enjoy The Garden of Ruth.

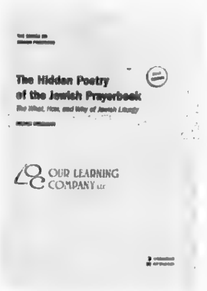
The Hidden Poetry of the Jewish Prayerbook: The What, How and Why of Jewish Liturgy, by Reuven Kimelman (Our Learning Company, Editor Sergiu S. Simmel, 2005), is a remarkable, goose-bumpy learning experience.

I write "experience" because the centrepieces of this three-pronged work are 18 audio CD lectures of approximately 30 minutes each. The other two prongs are a summary text of each lecture and what the editor refers to as mindmaps: a thematic, genome mapping-like visualization that captures the content and the flow of each of the lectures.

Kimelman has divided the lectures into four volumes: introductory blessings, the Shema liturgy, the Amidah liturgy, and the Shabbat and concluding prayers.



His approach is compelling and vastly informative. He brings countless references from the traditional repository of Jewish sources, yet inter-relates them in ways that are novel and intriguing, with fresh insight.

The work is aimed at anyone who is genuinely curious to learn about the Jewish prayerbook, the siddur, whether educator or layman.

Listening to Kimelman's explanations and following along on the mindmap of his presentation is an intense immersion into a university-level seminar about the siddur. But because it is also a seminar of discovery, we leave the immersion with feelings of exhilaration.

For further information about Kimelman's coursebook, visit the site at www.our-learning.com

Consul general addresses Yom Yerushalayim event

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general for Toronto and Western Canada spoke earlier this month at Beit Rayim Synagogue and School in honour of Yom Yerushalayim, the holiday celebrating Jerusalem's reunification 40 years ago.

Some 70 people heard Brosh's speech, given May 17, a day after Yom Yerushalayim. It was titled, "Jerusalem: Past, Present and Future."

He opened by discussing Jerusalem's history, highlighting the painful 19 years and 10 days after the War of Independence, when Jews were barred from Jerusalem's holy sites.

"The truth is that in the last 40 years, it's the first time in decades that there is free access to any religion, and to any believer, to any holy site in Israel," Brosh said.

He recalled that in 1993, while he was serving in Cairo at Israel's embassy there, 200 Libyans were permitted to come to Jerusalem for a pilgrimage.

Ya'acov Brosh

"Even one of our worst enemies, the citizens of this country, were allowed to come into Israel," he said.

Brosh moved from Jerusalem's history to discuss the religious and political problems that continue to plague the city.

Brosh noted the Palestinian view that Jews have no right – religious, historical or otherwise – to the city.

Echoing the tagline of an Israeli car insurance ad, which implores that while driving, "Don't be right, be wise," Brosh said of the Palestinians: "If they want to be right, they will have zero. If they want to be wise, they might have for the first time in their history a state, even with a capital that they dream about."

Brosh concluded with some trivia and facts about Jerusalem and its development, and ended on a positive note about the future.

"Jerusalem has a lot to expect in the future," he said. "There are many challenges, there are many hopes, but there is a good reason to believe that 40 years from today, hopefully 3,000 years from today, another Israeli consul general will stand here and raise a toast for 6,000 years for Jerusalem as the capital of Israel."

Brosh, a Haifa native, has been Israel's consul general in Toronto since 2003.

The evening also included a lively blend of Jerusalem songs performed by the Beit Rayim Choir.

"It was a wonderful evening. We wanted to get a lot of people from the community out, and I think we did that," said Chuck Ticker, chair of the event's planning committee.

"We've never had such a distinguished guest…it was a very impressive night."

Aliyah 'enhances quality of Israeli society'

Ultimately, the goal will be for olim to have a job waiting for them before they leave for Israel, he added.

The agency is developing information services and a contact centre with a 24-hour phone line to answer olim's queries on even the simplest questions, like how to open a bank account or register their children in school. Yet another program being developed is one of "communal absorption" which would see olim from a single diaspora community stay together once in Israel.

Salomon's role as the head of the aliyah and absorption department may well signal a shift in strategy at the agency. He was recruited after a 20-plus year career in the private sector where he worked for Gerber's Israel and East Mediterranean division and for Osem-Nestle, one of Israel's largest food producers and exporters.

He took the Jewish Agency job after something of a mid-life epiphany. "I was looking for some added value to society – to touch people," he said.

"It's a great challenge as I deeply believe in the importance of aliyah to the state of Israel." Accepting new immigrants not only strengthens Israel's demographic profile but it also "enhances the quality of Israeli society" with their human capital, he said.

Aliyah is changing, Salomon continued. In the 1990s, as the Soviet Union disintegrated and people saw an opportunity to leave, one million moved to Israel. "That time has passed." Immigrants today are "olim by choice and their needs must be addressed."

Two outlooks on famous landmark cases that have shaped our society.

Join Join Arthur Stern, renowned Toronto criminal lawyer, and popular Aish Rabbis, Dan Rand and Dovid Zauderer, who will present the secular and Torah perspectives on 3 contentious and controversial legal cases.

The Miranda Warning - Wednesday, June 13
One of the most famous legal terms is the Miranda warning. It is taken as a fundamental requirement to safeguarding the rights of all citizens. This session will describe the precedent setting case that established this law and explore it's beneficial and injurious impact. The Torah's unique take will bring new clarity to our understanding on the concept of warning suspects.

The Rodriguez Case - Wednesday, June 20
There is probably no greater emotional legal situation than the controversy over Euthanasia, also known as assisted suicide. The case of Sue Rodriguiz captured the imagination of Canada as this young woman appealed to the Supreme Court to be allowed a physician assisted suicide. Our experts in Canadian law and Torah ethics will challenge us to examine our own perspective on the legal and moral implications of "mercy killing."

The Zundel Case - Wednesday, June 27
Fundamental to a free society is free speech. At the same time the simple example of yelling "fire" in a crowded building is recognized as being untenable. To have clarity is to see both sides of an issue. This session will "defend" and "prosecute" the man who galvanized the nation about this issue. The Torah and Talmud viewpoints will focus and deepen our understanding.

All sessions begin at 8 pm at Aish Thornhill Learning Centre, 949 Clark Avenue West

Chabad raises over $40,000 for local Israelis

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

There's an old adage that says if you're going to host an event you should always "leave 'em laughing."

And on May 17, at the fourth annual Spirit of Community Dinner, a fundraising awards gala hosted by the Beth Chabad Israeli Community Centre to benefit the growing Israeli community in the GTA, that's exactly what what they did.

More than 800 people attended the dinner hosted by Rabbi Yisroel Landa, Chabad's local spiritual leader. They were treated to an evening of speeches, auctions, food and song before the closing guest speaker, popular U.S. radio talk-show host Dennis Prager, took the podium and served up some yuks.

Organizers for the event called the $200-a-plate event the most successful they've had, raising nearly $40,000 from the auctions alone.

Sold were the rights to a street name in Vaughan, the use of a private plane for a day, a mini-motorbike, a health club membership for two, a pair of Maple Leafs tickets and catering for 100 people.

"Chabad provides assistance to immigrants in all aspects, creating a home away from home. You are all a part of this accomplishment," Rabbi Landa told the audience.

He then helped to lead a prayer for all the Israeli, Canadian and U.S. soldiers "who sacrifice daily to protect life."

Joyce Frustaglio, regional councillor for the city of Vaughan, received Chabad's community service award for her commitment to help her city's less fortunate. She thanked the audience for "sharing their hard-earned dollars" with Chabad.

"I believe in Rabbi Landa's cause… he wants us to be part of a strong whole," Chai said.

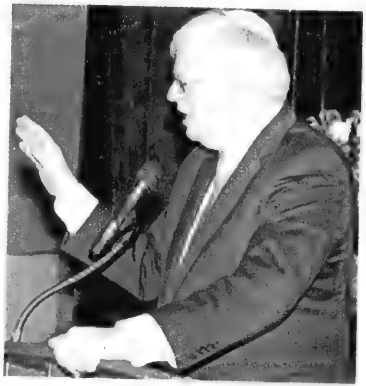
Pediatrician Gideon Koren received the humanitarian award for his tireless efforts in children's medicine at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

Koren, who also composes music, played guitar and led the audience in a sing-along to a song he composed for the event called Ve'ahavta.

"I believe each one of us has the ability to do good in our community," he told the crowd.

After all the awards were presented and the auctioneering was done, it was time for Prager.

In his booming, radio-friendly voice, the bombastic Prager told the audience he normally speaks about "serious" issues, such as war, religion, life and death, but decided instead to use the opportunity to opine about happiness.



Dennis Prager

"I support Chabad but I don't look like or am a Chabadnik, but I finally figured out why," he said. "Because Chabad's rabbis are happy. Worship God in joy, that's the motto of [Chabad], which is why it draws people to it."

Prager went on to give what amounted to an hour-long discourse-cum-stand-up routine on the perils of unhappiness and what he called everyone's moral obligation to "bring happiness" to the world.

"The older I get, the less sympathy I have for the unhappy," Prager said. "We who sympathize with the unhappy are enablers. Do you think the happiest among Muslims want to kill others and blow themselves up? No."

He exhorted the audience to examine their lives and choose to leave self-pity and bitterness behind.

Using a biblical analogy, Prager likened complaining to evil.

"God seems to have limitless patience for almost anything. But in the book of Numbers, why was God so angry at the Jews in the desert?" he asked rhetorically. "Not because of false idols and such… because they kept complaining."

The quip was met with uproarious laughter.

Prager then segued into his finale, a morality tale about the seduction of false satisfaction.

"God made us dissatisfied for a reason. Because satisfaction leads to no achievement," he said. "Why do we keep searching for a cure for cancer? Because we're dissatisfied. Only cows are completely satisfied. Don't be a cow, it does injustice to your humanity."

In closing, Prager praised Chabad again, calling its approach to religion and life something that increases people's happiness.

"And any organization that does that is doing something right."

Sela's goal to bring Israelis home

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It hasn't even been a year since he arrived in Toronto to take over as the Israeli House director, but Nir Sela has hit the ground running as he works to help Israelis get back home.

The Israeli House, a component of the Israeli consulate, aims to help Israelis who have moved from the Holy Land keep their connection to Israel in hopes they'll eventually return.

Sela has been running the Israeli House since the former director, David Gidron, moved back to Israel with his wife Dina, who was also a shlichah working with the Jewish Agency as the regional director of the Israel Aliyah Centre. Sela's wife Liane replaced Dina.

Before he arrived in Toronto, Sela, a father of two little girls, was a businessman working in various areas of the business world, including positions as a CEO of a factory and a finance manager.

He said that having a background in business management has helped him in his role as the Israeli House director.

"I'm not afraid to speak to anyone here. I have no connection with them, but I speak eye to eye. Most of the people who run the [UJA] Federation, the Israeli Forum and the Israeli community are business related and they come from a financial point of view and it's easier to understand them on that level," Sela said.

"To run an event is to produce something, so there really isn't much of a change. As long as you are, in your heart, connected to it."

The Israeli House is an initiative that was created in the 1980s by the late Ofira Navon, the wife of former Israeli president Yitzchak Navon, to change the negative attitudes Israelis have towards those who decide to move away.

Sela said that Navon wanted to focus her efforts on building a community to connect former Israelis and their children – some of whom were born abroad – to Israel, rather than write them off as expatriates who abandoned their homeland.

"As long as there is a connection, they may be returning citizens. If there is no connection, they will never return. This was the idea and it was adopted by the Ministry of Immigration and Absorption in Israel, who decided to open Israeli Houses in about 15 communities around the world that have large Israeli populations."

Nir Sela

Sela said that he'd like to continue many of the projects that Gidron started, such as establishing a Toronto chapter of the Israeli Boy and Girl Scouts Federation (Hitachdut Hatsofim Ve Hatsofot Be Israel).

The Israeli House also co-ordinates events to celebrate Jewish holidays and national milestones such as Yom Ha'atzmaut.

Sela said that he helped organize the visit of the Israeli dancers from Nachlat Yehuda Youth Village in Rishon Lezion, who performed late last month at Queen's Park in Toronto during the Yom Ha'atzmaut celebrations.

Sela anticipates that the Schwartz/Reisman Centre in Thornhill, a part of the new Lebovic Community Centre at the corner of Bathurst Street and Weldrick Road, will be a benefit to the Israeli community in the Greater Toronto Area, most of whom reside in Thornhill.

The Blue and White school, which is an Israeli Sunday school at Leo Baeck Day School that is supported by the Israeli House, has a curriculum that focuses more on speaking Hebrew and learning about Israeli culture and traditions, rather than religion.

While Canadian Jews tend to connect to their community through their affiliation to their synagogue, Israelis tend to be more nationalistic and secular, Sela said.

He believes that the reason Israelis don't connect to Judaism the way Canadian Jews do, is because when they live in Israel, they feel Jewish by nature.

"You don't go to synagogue, you don't eat kosher, but you're Jewish. When you get here, you consider that it'll [either] cost you $1,100 a month to send your child to a Jewish school or you can send him to a public school in Thornhill, which will be half Israeli anyway. You'll go with the public school!"

He said a problem with that arises when the children hit the age of bar mitzvah and they don't speak, read or write Hebrew, adding that the programming offered by the Israeli House aims to address issues like this.

Sela also referred to the perceived notion that the Israeli community in Toronto is somewhat separate from the rest of the Jewish community.

He said when he first arrived in Canada, he got the impression from the Israeli community that the major Jewish groups in Canada don't do enough to reach out to Israelis.

"But as I see it now, the federation tries to communicate with the Israeli community and to bring Israelis into the federation. By bringing organizations like the Israeli Forum into the federation as an Israeli representative, they help the Israeli Forum establish itself and help them financially in order to provide Israeli events."

He said that the long-term goals of the Israeli Forum and the federation are completely different from those of the Israeli House because they want to build a strong Jewish community here and he wants to build a strong Jewish community in Israel.

"But the short-term goals are the same. It's building the connection here in order to bring the second generation either to experience Israel or to get to Israel," he said.

Taking a stand in Lebanon

It appears that the prime minister of Lebanon, Fouad Siniora, and his government have decided to try to save their country. Having last summer surrendered Lebanon's sovereignty to the bloodthirsty thuggery of Hezbollah leader Sheikh Hassan Nasrallah and his army of Shiite surrogates of Iran, they are now making a stand against the latest cadre of Islamic extremists to claim freedom of action on Lebanese soil: Shakir al-Abssi and his Sunni Palestinian surrogates of Al Qaeda called Fatah Al-Islam.

Siniora sent the Lebanese army to expel al-Abssi's group from the Nahr al-Bared refugee camp in northern Lebanon. In the ensuing fighting, some three dozen Lebanese soldiers were killed along with some two dozen Fatah al-Islamis and a number of innocent bystanders.

But Siniora called upon the international community to help him. The United States is spearheading an international military aid effort of restocking and resupplying the Lebanese Army. American planes arrived from Kuwait, flying with permission across Jordanian airspace. Moderate Arab leaders, such as King Abdullah of Jordan, well understand the dangers to their own rule posed by extremist groups such as Fatah al-Islam.

Al-Abssi is well known in the area. He is reported to have been an associate of Abu Musab al-Zarqawi, the leader of Al Qaeda in Iraq who was killed last summer. Last Saturday, Al-Jazeera television broadcast a message from Al-Abssi in which he said: "We say to you, the guardians of the American project, the Sunni people will be leaders in fighting the Jews, the Americans and their loyalists, [a reference to Siniora and his government]."

Responding to the disparagement and taunts from Fatah al-Islam, Siniora described the group as a "terrorist organization that claims to be Islamic and to defend Palestine."

Al-Abssi's warning to the Lebanese government and its supporters was menacingly echoed late last week by Nasrallah, who accused Siniora of being too closely allied to Washington. Nasrallah advised against trying to root out the Al Qaeda confederates from their holes in Nahr al-Bared.

"We will not accept or provide cover or be partners in this [the Lebanese army's attack against Fatah Al-Islam]," he said. Nasrallah then declared that Hezbollah – and thus the Iranians and the Syrians with whom he is allied – should support the Al Qaeda-linked Palestinian group.

The implications of al-Abssi's and Nasrallah's declarations are far-reaching and deeply ominous: the Iranian-Syrian-Hezbollah axis is willing to join cause with the Al Qaeda extremists in Lebanon. If they are willing to take up arms for Al Qaeda's benefit in Lebanon, where else are they prepared to do so?

To be sure, the battleground in Gaza springs first to mind. Al Qaeda is attempting to get a foothold there and the Hamas government is happy to accommodate them in exchange for help in waging war against the Zionist enemy. After all, as Al-Abssi so sneeringly expressed on Al Jazeera, his group will be among the "leaders in fighting the Jews."

Siniora understands that the threat posed by Fatah al-Islam is not only to the independence and sovereignty of his country, but to its very existence. By lending support to his army, it appears that countries in the region other than Israel also understand that the threat is not to Lebanon alone. It appears they are also making a stand.

25 years ago in The CJN

Against the backdrop of significant developments in the Iran-Iraq war and air clashes between Israeli and Syrian jets, U.S. Secretary of State Alexander Haig pledged that the United States would involve itself heavily in stalemated Palestinian autonomy talks and the crisis in Lebanon.

Violence in Gaza

On behalf of the Liberal caucus, I would like to express my dismay at the ongoing violence in the Gaza Strip. Too often we have seen that it is innocent victims in Israel and Gaza who have paid the price in the power struggle between rival Palestinian factions. I join with all Canadians in expressing my hope that an immediate and ultimately lasting ceasefire can be achieved between the parties.

I condemn those who are responsible for the Qassam rocket attacks on southern Israel, and I call for an immediate and unconditional end to the hostilities. I call on all parties in the region to respect international humanitarian law and avoid at all costs the targeting of innocent civilians and civilian infrastructure. Civilians must have unfettered access to humanitarian aid and I call on the parties to ensure that NGOs and relief organizations in the region have the ability to deliver needed aidto those in need to avoid a looming humanitarian disaster.

Israel must be allowed to live in peace and security, and we must continue to work toward an independent, democratic and viable Palestinian state living peacefully alongside Israel.

Short-term censorship gain

In the article "Black Panther leader not allowed into Canada," (CJN May 25), Len Rudner is quoted as saying that "it is the job of the [Canadian Jewish] Congress" and "our community responsibility, to advocate on behalf of our community."

But by what twisted logic does silencing another community leader from speaking to his own community become advocating for your community? No one is preventing Jews from speaking out against racism. Isn't it Jewish leaders who are doing the silencing and preventing others from speaking?

Censorship is a double-edged sword. Just ask academic Daniel Pipes about how he tried to freely speak to his community at York University, or when former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu tried to do the same at Concordia University. Short-term censorship gains come at the cost of long-term free-speech pain. Haven't we learned our lesson yet?

Second time on the March

I am a survivor who went on the March of the Living last year for the first time, and I was asked to come again in April 2007.

The second time around, I felt it would be easier for me to see and live through the past. I was wrong. It was harder the second time. The first time, after some 60-odd years, you are numb. The second time, you are digesting and absorbing the experience in more detail.

Thanks to the organizers of the March of the Living and a few chaperons who helped me with some intense moments, I am happy I went and could contribute to the students' knowledge of our dark past.

Thank you from former IDF soldier

From 1973 to 1977 I served in a Nachal unit of the Israel Defence Forces. I had no family in Israel and knew no one in my unit. One day, my sergeant handed me a box that he said was for "lone" soldiers, and was sent from "some people" in Canada. I can't tell you the joy that receiving that package gave me! Thirty-four years later, I can still remember the thrill of receiving that little package. Keep doing what you're doing. These small acts move mountains.

Falwell supported the Jewish people

The whole world, not just the Christian world, lost a giant with the passing of Rev. Jerry Falwell. Rev. Falwell's moral clarity and courage resonated with many Jews, who appreciated and admired his strength of character. His leadership in promoting responsible behaviour and defending the natural family was unmatched, as was his inflexible resolve to see his country support Israel and the Jewish people. In fact, the two were connected. Many ask me why men like Rev. Falwell are so supportive of Israel and the Jewish people. The answer is because men like him are the last repository in our culture of the belief that there is such a thing as right and wrong in this world, and that we ought to strive to do the right thing in all of our endeavours. Rev. Falwell will be truly missed.

March of the Living

Three generations

By NATE LEIPCIGER

I have been on the March of the Living many times throughout the years, and it never gets any easier. This year it was even more emotionally difficult and intense.

On Yom Hashoah, some 8,000 young people, their chaperons and a handful of survivors gathered in the yard of Auschwitz I for the march to Birkenau. We marched in silence and with pride, and with our thoughts of the 1.2 million Jews who travelled the same road to their death. We marched with arms linked, my grandson, Josh, on one of my arms and my daughter, Arla, on the other. A sea of blue jackets stretched out as far as we could see. Some people were draped in Israeli flags, and others had tzitzit dangling below their jackets. The Nazis gave us a one-way ticket to Auschwitz, and we come back with three generations of Jews.

Eight thousand young, dedicated, committed and bright Jews from around the world marched that road together. My thoughts went back to the day I first marched there, with my father. At that time, we did not know that it was the last road we would walk with our family.

I spoke of my experiences in one of the barracks in Birkenau to 200 students from Toronto. The entire block was filled with our young people, who had interrupted their studies to come to commemorate those who were murdered there. With their faces wet with tears, they sat on the mud floor and listened in silence as I recounted my arrival with my family on Aug. 2, 1943.

That day, we arrived on the rail siding somewhere between Auschwitz and Birkenau. There on the arrival platform our fate was decided with a flick of the wrist of a Nazi officer. Those sent to the left were young and had able bodies fit for work; the others were sent to the right. I was among those. Through my father's courageous intervention, I was allowed to change from this line and join my father's line. We were marched to a barracks, where we were disrobed, shaved and tattooed, and where we found out that those who went to the right went to their death by gassing.

On our recent arrival in Poland, we went to the Gensza Cemetery in Warsaw, where we saw thousands of headstones of a great variety, some simple and some ornate, attesting to a diverse and rich community that lived in Poland for 1,000 years. That evening, we welcomed Shabbat in the Nozik synagogue, filled to overflowing with people from around the globe, including some from the small but growing Jewish community in Poland, all singing in unison in our common language of prayer.

The days that followed were a virtual roller-coaster of emotions. We visited old synagogues and the death camps of Belzec, Majdanek and Treblinka, where various survivors spoke of their families that were murdered there. We mourned and remembered those who were murdered in forests at sites such as Tikoczyn, Jadwebno and others. We also rejoiced at the memory of our great sages in Krakow and Lublin, and the various accomplishments of today's vibrant Jewish communities in Poland. We ended the week with a candlelit vigil to commemorate the shooting death of members of a Toronto family.

Then we emerged from the depth of sadness in Poland to the joy of life in Israel. We arrived there on Friday and proceeded directly to the Kotel for prayers and thanksgiving.

We spent a solemn day remembering the soldiers who fell in Israel's wars and stood with all of Israel as the sirens wailed for two minutes to commemorate the dead. That evening, we participated in a moving national ceremony at Latrun, which took us from the solemn observance of Yom Hazikaron to a joyous celebration of Yom Ha'atzmaut, with song, dance and unbridled burst of energy and exuberance.

Th young men and women who participated on the March were focused, intelligent and articulate and will ensure our Jewish survival. The March of the Living has proved to be a life-changing event and an unequalled, unique educational experience.

Nate Leipciger, a survivor, lives in Toronto.

A journey of stories and images

By MARK S. ANSHAN

The experience of being on the March of the Living is one of sharing stories and witnessing images that pierce one's emotions. It is also one of striving to understand the horror that was the Holocaust and embracing the hope and promise that is Israel.

I had the privilege recently of attending the March of the Living, spending Yom Hashoah in Poland on the march. We had the opportunity to guide and teach some 180 young Jewish students about the Holocaust as we journeyed together and experienced what has clearly become an essential program in our informal Jewish education.

En route to Warsaw just as our students were about to drift off and take in what would be much-needed rest, I walked through the plane and asked students for their thoughts as they began this journey.

"I'm really nervous – I don't know what to expect," Ilana told me, then went on to say, "This is something you need to do. I feel responsible to the Jewish people, our history, our family, our future. I know this trip will be hard physically, emotionally and mentally" (and indeed it was), but she continued, "I hope it will be life changing and a learning experience."

Michael said, "It's inevitable I'll be sad, but I want to try and understand how was it possible that this happened and how is it that it could not be prevented."

Our week in Poland was a combination of visits to Polish towns and villages to see and learn first-hand of the incredible Jewish community that was a major force in Poland and, with the exception of a very few souls, completely eradicated in the death factories. We visited several of them – Auschwitz I and Birkenau (Auschwitz II), Belzec, Majdanek, Treblinka. These visits, together with memorial ceremonies at places of mass murder in beautiful forests and quaint towns, left us paralyzed in our thoughts, unable to fully understand how and why this tragedy of our people occurred. But as we are reminded, it's not for us to try and understand why but to remember, learn and teach – to remember our loved ones whom we never had the chance to meet and love and to teach all who must listen so that this will not happen again.

In Birkenau, we walk quietly and took our places in a clearing next to Gas Chamber/Crematorium II in front of the memorial tablets for our ceremony, remembering those who perished. As we began our remembrance, to our right on the selection ramp that transverses Birkenau from the entrance to the far end next the gas chambers, we saw hundreds of young Israeli soldiers in uniform who had also come to be part of the march.

Tears came to my eyes as I was struck by the irony and pride that we felt seeing Israeli soldiers – young people only a few years older than the students sitting there – who defend not only our beloved Jewish state but also all of us – our Diaspora Jewish community – and they are walking through a death facility intended to wipe all Jews from the earth that would make it unnecessary for the creation of Israel.

Anshan reads a story of Treblinka just before the group enters the camp.

While this image was taking hold before us, Cory – one of our students – came before the group and told the story of his grandfather – a survivor of Birkenau.

The next day – with 8,000 Jews from around the world – we marched together from Auschwitz I to Birkenau, holding Israeli flags high, and as we passed through the front gate of Birkenau, we joined together chanting "Shma Israel."

We assembled at the far end of Auschwitz I, where a memorial stands in front of the beautiful tall birch trees that line the far boundary of this evil place. During the time before the March of the Living ceremony began, I walked off on my own and went to Gas Chamber/Crematorium III. I thought about the Rally for Truth, Light and Freedom held by the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto last December – our loud and clear protest against the Iranian president who dares to deny that this happened – and wondered how anyone could possibly believe that this genocide did not happen.

On our way to Treblinka we stopped in Tikoczyn and learned how this small Jewish shetl – which looks and feels like Anatevka from Fiddler on the Roof – was destroyed; its Jewish community taken to the forest outside the town and massacred. We visited the site and offered our prayers. Finally, before coming to the memorial that is Treblinka, we visited Jedwabne and the site where on July 10, 1941, half of this small Polish town murdered the other half – 1,600 men, women and children – all but seven of the town's Jews.

We left Poland sad and disheartened – understanding a little better what happened but still not able to find the answer to "why?" We took some comfort in knowing that a small Jewish community is being rekindled in what was the centre of Jewish life in Europe.

We arrived in Israel in the early morning hours, and stopped to plant trees in the forest near Modi'in. We were privileged to participate in a Yom Hazikaron service at Kibbutz Amir with Israelis, remembering the more than 22,000 Israeli soldiers who fought in the wars since the day David Ben-Gurion declared the establishment of Israel. The next night at Latrun our students danced and sang with Israeli soldiers in front of the memorial wall, marking the end of Yom Hazikaron and the beginning of Yom Ha'atzmaut, a memorable image of young Jews – the next generation of leaders in Israel and the Diaspora – celebrating together and forming the bonds that symbolize what it means to be Jewish.

This remarkable journey – life changing – ended with all of us having learned about the horrors that was the Holocaust and the hope and promise that is Israel. All of us returned to Canada with a strengthened identity of why we are Jewish and confirming all that we knew – that together we must live, protect and build our community for the generations that will follow us. In remembering and leading others, our challenge is to never forget the tragedy that befell so many of our people and share this learning with the rest of our community.

All of us – students and adults alike – learned about and experienced the sadness and disheartening stories and images of the Holocaust, followed by the hope for the future that Israel represents.

Not just Mickey Mouse

Farfour, a rodent look-alike that resembles Mickey Mouse, made his debut on Al-Aqsa TV recently. Created by Hamas, the black-and-white replica appears in Friday-morning programming that targets young children. In a high-pitched squeak, he extols the "virtues" of world domination by Islamists, chanting in one episode, "We will return the Islamic community to its former greatness, and liberate Jerusalem, liberate Iraq, and liberate all the countries of the Muslims invaded by the murderers." He also teaches his impressionable young audience about "the oppressive Zionist occupation," which all children must "resist."

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

In breaks between Farfour's outbursts, viewers call the Hamas-run station, chanting anthems that attack Israel and reciting poems about war and destruction.

Called Tomorrow's Pioneers, the program has caused great concern both in Israel and elsewhere. Diane Disney Miller, the late Walt Disney's daughter, has described Hamas as "pure evil" for resorting to such reckless indoctrination of children.

But calls to cancel the show have fallen on deaf ears. According to a Hamas spokesperson, removing Farfour would be seen as "a political surrender to Israel." And in his response to mounting opposition to the program, Fathi Hamad, chairman of the Al-Aqsa television board in Gaza City, commented that "this campaign of criticism is part of a plan orchestrated by the West and the occupying power to attack Islam on the one hand and the Palestinian cause on the other. We have our own ways to educate our children, and any criticism of this approach is shocking interference in our internal affairs."

Sadly, this "education" goes way beyond the rants of a makeshift Mickey Mouse. In addition to other TV offerings and a variety of music videos that glorify suicide terrorism and preach jihad against Israel and the West, there is troubling evidence, as reported by the Israel Ministry of Foreign Affairs, that Palestinian Authority schools, summer camps, mosques and official media have all persisted in promoting a culture of hate, with children as their pawns of choice.

In a comprehensive document titled From Nationalist Battle to Religious Conflict, Palestinian Media Watch (PMW) describes the contents of newly published 12th grade textbooks, released into Palestinian schools last year. As stated by PMW researchers, "these schoolbooks make no attempt to educate for peace and coexistence with Israel." Rather, they continue, the "teachings repeatedly reject Israel's right to exist, present the conflict as a religious battle for Islam, teach Israel's founding as imperialism, and actively portray a picture of the Middle East, both verbally and visually, in which Israel does not exist at all."

With this systemic brainwashing of a whole new generation of Palestinians, it's little wonder the prospects for peace with Israel seem so elusive.

Will there be a war this summer?

With great fanfare, it was announced last week that the Israel Defence Forces were conducting a general command drill. The week before, it held an important war game. One would have to be naive to think the Arab camp is just sitting there and not conducting drills, manoeuvres and large-scale training exercises.

Ze'ev Schiff in Tel Aviv

The Syrians are talking about a major military exercise that will last more than a week. They say all preparations must be complete by June 1, in case Israel attacks. While Hezbollah continues to lick its wounds, it's trying to establish new defence lines, re-arm and step up training. One of its new approaches is to recruit Shiites who belonged to Amal, as well as Sunni volunteers. Hamas is continuing its efforts to build up a semi-regular army in the Gaza Strip. The organization's self-confidence is growing because it sees that Israel can't stop the barrage of Qassam rockets.

Reactions to the Winograd Committee report also tell us something about the Arabs' military preparations. The Syrians say the report's conclusions will increase Israel's frustration, and one must be wary of frustrated people who seek revenge and see war as an outlet.

Radical Arab organizations such as Hezbollah and Hamas claim to have found a tactic to prevent Israeli military victories: continue the war of attrition. Moderate Arab countries such as Egypt and Jordan are worried about the Israeli government's weakness. A weak government will not be able to make political concessions, and this increases the danger of armed confrontation.

Many people say there will be war this summer. Are the pessimists right? The question that should be asked is whether one of the sides plans to declare war. Apart from Israel, there are four parties – Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas – who must be asked this question. Iran will determine whether Hezbollah launches a new war. Tehran is involved in large-scale military operations in a number of places: Iraq, Afghanistan, Lebanon and the Palestinian territories, but its primary focus is nuclear development.

A major war today, initiated by Iran, could endanger its main objectives. For Iran, a steady stream of low-key military action combined with cash flow is preferable. Tehran has ordered Hezbollah to halt its efforts to topple the Lebanese government. Iran also knows that kidnapping more Israeli soldiers will set off a major conflagration.

Hezbollah will not embark on an all-out war if Iran is against it. If it could, Hezbollah would renew its war of attrition, but the organization's freedom of action in Lebanon is limited. Unusual circumstances would be needed for Hezbollah to go to war again today.

Another problem is Hamas; Hamas could ignite a war in the Gaza Strip. This organization's military arm is frustrated by the Palestinians' successes. The more serious leaders of Hamas know that a war this summer would be too early to serve their purposes.

A year from now, the Gaza Strip will pose a greater threat to Israel, especially if the government doesn't come up with better solutions to the conflict. What is happening today to Sderot could happen someday to Ashkelon. It's a mistake to think the IDF has any desire to reoccupy the Gaza Strip today. There is no need to "save" the government from extremist generals. There are greater extremists among the politicians.

The most complex problem is Syria. There is no question that Syria is readying for combat. Again, the question is whether it has plans to initiate a war, or suspects that Israel does. The military emphasis of the Syrian army is on firepower – various kinds of heavy artillery rockets, some of them new models, missiles and state-of-the-art anti-tank weapons. The Russians have also equipped Syria with sophisticated anti-aircraft missiles. Syria is capable of surprising Israel, mainly through hit-and-run attacks. But it knows there could be a heavy price to pay for a large-scale war, including the fall of the Alawite regime.

A cautious conclusion is that none of the parties today are interested in an all-out war. But war could erupt by mistake. For example, if the other side's intentions are incorrectly assessed, or if a local military campaign veers out of control and sparks a major showdown. For safety's sake, Israel needs to step up its vigilance in the sphere of intelligence, as well as to reinforce IDF troops on the Golan Heights and hone the army's quick-response capabilities.

When aid is exploited for terror

Many well-intentioned people around the world give generously to organizations such as Doctors without Borders (Médecins Sans Frontières), Human Rights Watch and Amnesty International, assuming that these groups are doing good deeds. So when officials and employees are found to be involved in terror, it's a profound shock. But the recent discovery of direct evidence of such terrorist links is too serious to ignore.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

In April, Mazab Bashir, a Palestinian from Gaza employed by Doctors Without Borders was arrested by Israel for planning terror attacks. Bashir was not a new recruit who had somehow infiltrated the ranks of this NGO – he had been working with the group for more than five years. But on the side, Bashir was also working closely with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), receiving "military" training, and practising to assassinate Prime Minister Ehud Olmert. The PFLP is designated as a terrorist organization by the United States, the European Union, and Canada.

Bashir, like other terrorists who abuse Israel's readiness to provide humanitarian assistance to the Palestinians, despite the terror campaigns, exploited his status as an NGO official to enter Jerusalem for surveillance and to prepare the plot. He was arrested in the process.

While this case might be dismissed as exceptional, others linked to Doctors without Borders have promoted incitement and hatred that justifies terror. Medical volunteers sent to Gaza are encircled by Palestinian "suffering" and kept away from the weapons smuggling and daily rocket attacks against Israel. In the process, some naively, and others willfully, become supporters of the Palestinian cause, while officials of this NGO remain passive.

In another case, three "well-respected" groups claiming to promote human rights came to the aid of another PFLP member. On May 2, Human Rights Watch, FIDH (based in France) and the World Organization Against Torture (OMCT) published a joint press release condemning Israel for preventing Shawan Jabarin from traveling. Jabarin is the general director of Al-Haq, a radical Palestinian group that works closely with the Geneva-based International Commission of Jurists. According to the NGOs' statement, the travel ban violated Jabarin's rights.

But this statement omitted the minor point that in 1985, Jabarin was convicted for recruiting members for the PFLP. After serving his sentence, he returned to his involvement with the PFLP, and Jordan also placed him on the list of Palestinians who are barred from entering that country.

These two blatant examples illustrate the cynical manipulation of moral principles such as human rights and humanitarian aid.

Recently, World Bank officials in the Middle East joined the process, perhaps taking advantage of the scandal at the top of that organization. A highly publicized report that repeated the themes of Palestinian suffering and Israeli responsibility was based entirely on unsubstantiated reports published by political NGOs and United Nations organizations. The World Bank "technical team" simply cut and pasted claims made by the UN's Office for Co-ordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA), B'tselem and Peace Now.

Hundreds of journalists around the world gave this report headline coverage, without bothering to ask whether the information was accurate. Few, if any, knew or cared that Peace Now had retracted its earlier claims, or that the OCHA's officials include Allegra Pacheco, an extremist anti-Israel activist.

Pacheco heads the OCHA's "Information and Advocacy" unit in Jerusalem and has often used terms such as "apartheid" to demonize Israel. In September 2000, she addressed a rally in Washington, D.C., calling for the abolition of Israel and the "complete and unrestricted return to Palestine, all of it from the Jordan River to the Mediterranean Sea."

These examples of the exploitation of humanitarian and human rights principles and rhetoric in order to justify terror and demonization go beyond the attacks on Israel. Beyond the damage resulting from their obsessive and unjustified condemnations of Israel, the actions of the World Bank, Human Rights Watch, Doctors Without Borders and others who claim to speak in the name of social conscience and morality have all but destroyed these principles.

Donors and officials who provide their money and names to these organizations also have the responsibility to insure that this support is not abused.

The Kirshner File

Nathan Englander's circuitous route to fame

At 37, Nathan Englander is already one of the most celebrated short story writers and novelists in America. Not bad for a guy who was once a photographer's assistant.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Englander, whom critics have compared to Isaac Bashevis Singer and Cynthia Ozick, left an imprint eight years ago with the publication of a collection of short stories, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges, which was heralded and attained best-seller status.

Having achieved a measure of fame, he precipitously dropped out of sight, only to re-emerge when his first novel, The Ministry of Special Cases, was published in April.

So where had he been all these years?

"It was not a case of writer's block," said Englander, an approachable person of medium height, Mediterranean demeanour and curly black hair who was in Toronto recently to promote his historical novel. "I write endlessly. But for me, time is what this book demanded. I had to find a way through it. I didn't lose my nerve, but I lived with the terror that I might not finish it."

Described by one reviewer as Shakespearean in its tragic scope and power, The Ministry of Special Cases takes place in Argentina during the first year of the military government in 1976, unfolds against the backdrop of civil strife and revolves around a Jewish cemetery worker and his son, who suddenly disappears.

As Englander tells it, sitting in Random House's boardroom and happily munching on cookies and then a roast beef sandwich to ward off the hunger pangs of a missed lunch, the story had been germinating in his mind for more than a decade.

In 1989, when he was an exchange student at Hebrew University, he met a group of intriguing Argentine students who had been shaped by politics. "A fascination with the people became a fascination with the place."

Two years later, he went to Argentina to attend a friend's wedding. In terms of his development as a writer, it was an important step. As Englander wandered through Buenos Aires, stumbling into a neighbourhood built around a cemetery, he formed an obsession with bodies and bones and a fascination with the lionizing of the dead, the symbols and themes that permeate The Ministry of Special Cases.

After six weeks, he knew that a novel was welling up in him. "Argentina just seemed the place to set the novel," he noted.

Englander, who was born into a modern Orthodox family in West Hempstead, Long Island, began writing For the Relief of Unbearable Urges in 1994, when he attended the prestigious Writers' Workshop at the University of Iowa.

But even before Iowa, he knew that writing was in his blood. "I've always been language oriented. My brain is always spinning, and I'm not very good at turning it off. There are a million things I want to write. My writing is an obligation to the world in my head, which is a wholly separate universe."

For Englander, literature was also an escape from the "closed" milieu in which he had been brought up. "I didn't feel right in the world I was raised," he said, his dark eyes glowering.

Nathan Englander

Educated in a yeshiva, he internalized the values of Orthodoxy: early marriage, a houseful of children and the necessity of leading a strict religious Jewish life. "I didn't meet anyone who was not exactly like me or who had differing opinions," he recalled. "I didn't even have Conservative or Reform Jewish friends. It was only our way."

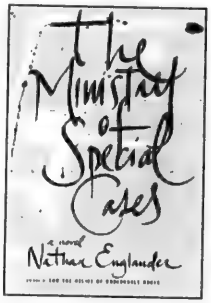
גלגול בפארק אווניו

Questioning that cramped shtetl lifestyle, Englander opted to study at secular Binghamton University rather than head off to an Israeli yeshiva like many of his friends. But even at Binghamton, he had one foot in Orthodoxy, hewing to the old ways by majoring in Judaic studies, but blazing a new path by taking a second major in creative writing.

At the urging of a roommate, he spent his junior semester at Hebrew University. "It was the year I grew up. I had never travelled anywhere before." In his first week in Jerusalem, which he adores, he gave up religion and became a secular Jew. By leaving Orthodoxy, he surprised even himself. "I wanted to be happy, and I would not have been happy as an Orthodox Jew. Not at all."



Having jettisoned the rituals of Judaism, Englander is irreligious today and regards his rejection of Orthodoxy as "a supreme act of rebellion." As he put it, "Now it's my life. There is no conflict anymore. This is the right world for me. My parents have been very supportive, though they want me to marry a nice Jewish girl."

Before settling down in Manhattan, where he currently lives, Englander embarked on a circuitous odyssey of self-discovery, during part of which he avoided writing altogether. "I didn't know people could become writers. I was probably afraid to dig in."

As this formative period unfolded, he worked in a photographer's studio in New York City, and never considered it as a waste of time. "I learned how to work hard and be focused." Parlaying his new-found knowledge, he went to Jerusalem to photograph new Anglo immigrants. What emerged from that summer in Israel was the realization that he really was hooked on writing.

He enrolled at at the University of Iowa for a master of fine arts degree, but the going was initially tough.

"I had no confidence in myself and had never been exposed to such people. Iowa was a pressure cooker, but I loved it. I learned discipline and craft."

In 1996, at the height of the Oslo peace process, he made aliyah. "I was dedicated to Israel and I loved Jerusalem." And as he pointed out, he personally hoped to witness the flowering of peace between Israel and the Palestinians. But after five years, he left Israel in disappointment. The second Palestinian uprising had broken out, dashing his dreams of peace, and the sensational success of For the Relief of Unbearable Urges heightened his writerly ambitions.

Turning another chapter in his life, he returned to New York in 2001. "It took me a long time to realize that New York was a better city for me. I thrive in Manhattan."

Englander reportedly received a considerable advance for his first book, and since then, he has been the recipient of various grants.

Yet he has not been coasting financially. At one juncture, he needed a loan just to cover his rent and pay for his groceries.

"It's a sad commentary on the speed at which I write," said Englander, who works virtually every day and has supplemented his income by teaching in Columbia University's MFA program.

Yet Englander, whose work has appeared in The Best American Short Stories, has no regrets whatsoever.

"I love to write and I've dedicated my life to writing. It's what I want to do. I really believe in it. I can't separate my life from writing and can't imagine anything else."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
>
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
>
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Aaron's passion is a model for all Jews

By RABBI AVROHOM JACKS

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

My wife and I were recently browsing in a Jewish bookstore when we came across a book on humour. Our eye caught one anecdote that we both thought was funny, and it came to mind when I was preparing this column.

The comedian who wrote the book asks the following question: "Since the purpose of woman wearing perfume is to make themselves more attractive to menfolk, why do they wear flowery perfume? I mean men don't appreciate flowers. Why would woman think that making themselves smell like a rose would appeal to men? Rather, if they really wanted to attract the attention of a man, they should wear a 'new car smell' scent."

As a member of the male part of our species, I can attest to the fact that there is something exhilarating about the scent of a new car. I remember when I picked up my new car from the dealer. The "new car" smell enveloped me, and it was indeed more delectable than any French perfume.

I remember how the engine purred as I eased my way into traffic. "This car is great!" I thought to myself. "What a thrill to drive something so new!"

As the months passed, the novelty faded. Somehow, that new car smell slowly becomes less exciting as we begin the search for the next material object intended to momentarily satisfy our craving for the new. If familiarity doesn't exactly breed contempt, it at least fosters boredom and complacency.

Yet, in this week's parshah, Behalotch, we read about a man who was different. He never lost his eagerness for the daily routine that he followed for most of his life.

After the Torah describes how God instructed Aaron how to light the menorah that stood in the Temple, the Torah adds, "Aaron did so." This is a puzzling statement. Obviously, Aaron was ready to fulfil a direct command from God. Wouldn't you do God's bidding, if He specifically and directly asked you to perform a certain commandment?

The Sifri answers that it does not only mean that Aaron followed God's command, but it teaches us "the praise of Aaron – that he did not change." In other words, at the end of his life, Aaron was still lighting the menorah with exactly the same degree of enthusiasm that he lit it with on his first day. Aaron, therefore, is the model of consistency and stability. He teaches us by example that we must fulfil our duties with eagerness and passion.

One can be inspired by the notion of tikkun olam, of healing the world. One can become aflame with a burning passion toward the ideals of human dignity and world peace. One can be motivated to make a donation, to give a speech, to shed a tear, to attend a rally or to argue a point.

However, the real and ultimate power of Judaism is that it has always inspired its people to cultivate their relationship with God on a continuous basis, every day of their lives, with unwavering enthusiasm.

During exciting days as well as monotonous days, on bright days and bleak days, our commitment to our heritage must be maintained and constantly increased.

Judaism is not only about a moving Yom Kippur experience or about an emotional memorial ceremony. It's something a Jew lives every moment of his life.

May we all be blessed with the ability to appreciate the sparkle of a new day, the wonder of learning and the glory and meaningfulness in daily, ordinary acts.

Rabbi Avrohom Jacks is spiritual leader of Congregation Zichron Kedoshim in Montreal.

Taking on a huge responsibility

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

In a brilliant line from The Believer, Henry Bean's stirring film about a Jewish neo-Nazi, the title character, Daniel Balint, is confronted by his sister, who finds him in a T-shirt bearing a swastika. When she challenges him as to how he can betray his people in this way, he replies that Jews are "not my people." Tell that to Hitler, she retorts, and Daniel scoffs: "So Hitler is the chief rabbi now? He decides?"

Her argument: in the bowels of Auschwitz, all Jews were equal. Hitler's reduction of Jewishness to blood made everyone prone to extermination. But Daniel is right too: today, Jewishness is chosen, dropped, reconstituted, caustically rejected, re-embraced, ambivalently shouldered, ignorantly ignored, indifferently thrust aside, and yes, even turned upside down in a fit of racist self-loathing. And much of this is done with little real sense of what the legacy of Judaism actually entails.

Jewish education, because of its potential to provoke religious connection and social change, carries an enormous responsibility. It's an opportunity to defuse the myths of communal Jewish politics and denominational prejudices and keep the students' eyes on the prize – the meaning of meaning; the quest for God; the power of spirit; the redemptiveness of texts; the humanity of others.

It's not a simple proposition to imbue our children with the values and beliefs that are important to us and have them incorporate such values in an unswerving fashion, and yet still be humbly receptive to other ideas, to other ways of thinking and to determining the best Jewish path.

Most of us err on one side or the other: circumscribing avenues of knowledge except for the ones we rigidly believe are Torah-true, or we do the reverse, blindly absorbing everything in the culture and banishing Jewish particularism for what is envisioned, often unwisely, as the Promised Land of modern life and modern love.

I have a dream – that we focus less on the colour of our neigbour's kippah and more on the content of our own kavanah. Less on the architecture of our shuls and more on how our hearts are moulded. Less on preconceived dogmatic formulations and more on the shock of the true, the sting of the unexpected, the possibility of the previously intolerable. That we teach our children not to memorize acceptable "answers" but each day to raise new, unforeseen and even unanswerable questions, and that we listen to these questions with pride and joy and overwhelming gratitude for their originality and independence, even if they express sentiments that run counter to our religious checklist.

This art of fostering our children's inquiring minds begins when they are young. When a child comes home from Grade 1, 2 or 3 and can't understand what the Lord is doing in this week's parshah, or how life and death and soul and suffering and just plain Torah works, we have an opportunity to affirm their creativity and to start them on their own journey, or we can bottle them up and make them feel less for having asked.

Jewish faith, writes Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, "is the courage to see the world as it is" – and, one might add, as it could be.

America's relationship with the Mideast

Power, Faith and Fantasy* by Michael B. Oren, W.W. Norton & Company.

Books

Bernard Baskin

This 700-page book is concerned with America's many-sided 230-year relationship with the Middle East – from the time of George Washington to George W. Bush. A brief review can convey, only haltingly, the book's variety and richness.

Eleven years after the United States declared its independence from Britain, American political and diplomatic leaders realized that if the threat of the Mediterranean Barbary pirates was to be overcome, an effective national government was necessary.

As a result, delegates from 12 of the original states gathered in Philadelphia to write a constitution. Oren writes, "The constitution, officially adopted in 1789, empowered Congress to declare war and to provide and maintain a navy. A threat from the Middle East had played a concrete role in creating a truly 'United States,' a consolidated nation capable of defending not only its borders at home but also its vital interests overseas."

The Middle East always enchanted Americans, enthralling them with visions of minarets and pyramids, oases, camels and dunes. Eager tourists with high expectations were invariably disappointed. In 1867, the "hawk-nosed and mustachioed" Mark Twain visited Palestine. He described it as a "hopeless, dreary, heartbroken land." He found the Sea of Galilee so tiny that he refused to pay the boat fare across. He asked, "Is it any wonder that Christ walked?"

Herman Melville ridiculed the efforts or ability of missionaries to transform eastern Orthodox Arabs, much less the Muslims, into American-style Protestants. "Might as well attempt to convert bricks into bride-cake as the Orientals into Christians."

Nevertheless, assorted missionaries came in astonishing numbers. Oren describes them as guileless and patronizing, haughty and unaffected, yet thoroughly well-intentioned.

The Israeli author Hillel Halkin has written, "Apart from Jews, evangelical Christians provide the strongest source of popular support that Israel has in America, or for that matter anywhere in the world. When Jews debate about how to relate to such support and express the fear that it is untrustworthy, they might reflect that a point of view with strong roots that are hundreds of years old is not likely to prove a straw in the wind."

The Balfour Declaration of 1917, which declared Britain's support for a Jewish homeland in Palestine, could not have been formulated without the tacit consent and approval of then-president Woodrow Wilson. The author indicates that when the declaration was announced, "a crowd of 100,000 Jews reportedly danced in gratitude outside the U.S. consulate in Odessa, with smaller demonstrations in front of U.S. legations in many countries. Telegrams of thanks billowed into the White House."

One of the great popularizers of the Middle East as a place of mystery and adventure was Lowell Thomas, an enterprising American reporter and photographer. He was unparallelled in his ability to manufacture legends.

In the 1920s, he turned the life of T.E. Lawrence into both a bestselling book and sensational sound and light show. In London alone, a million people saw the show, but it was in the United States that the Lawrence fad became a national frenzy. "Not since the belly dancers and camel rides at the Chicago exposition 30 years before had so many Americans been exposed to the gossamer charms of the Middle East," Oren writes.

Of all the myriad viewers of Thomas' act, only one was notably dissatisfied. "I saw your show last night and thank God the lights were out," Lawrence wrote to Thomas, rebuking him for his flagrant exaggerations and lies.

Oren is an eminent scholar and author of the recent bestselling book Six Days of War: June 1967 and the Making of the Modern Middle East. He concludes his massive volume in this way: "In the near future, Americans will have to cope with the threat of an expansionist Iran and with the dangers of Al Qaeda splinter groups. Above all, they will have to engage in brave introspection, re-examining their relationship to the Middle East and, through it, their relationship with the world."

The green Torah

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

You can hardly pick up a newspaper or turn on the television without finding out about some initiative to save the environment and care for the planet. Valuable advice but hardly new to our religion. Peek into a Torah and you can read what Judaism has known for thousands of years.

Here are some examples of that connection from the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life (COEJL):

- Bal tashchit (do not waste) teaches us to conserve resources.
- Shiluach ha-keyn (chasing away the mother bird) teaches us to safeguard all species.
- Shmita (sabbatical year) teaches us that economic justice and ecological sustainability are intimately related.
- And Shabbat reminds us that we are but one strand in the web of creation.

The COEJL site suggests that finding God in nature is a deeply Jewish experience and not some "New Age fad… Jewish liturgy is infused with descriptions and images of nature as an expression and embodiment of the Divine. Yet for more than a thousand years, Jews – even Judaism itself – have been distant from nature." The site has many suggestions about creating a "reconciliation" between Jews and nature. [www.coejl.org/jewviro.php]

Jewish tradition has continued to value nature and the environment. Here are some post-biblical sources:

- Look at My creations! See how beautiful and perfect they are! For your sake I created them all. Do not desolate and corrupt My world, for if you corrupt it there is no one to set it right after you. (Ecclesiastes Rabbah 7:1)
- If a man kills a tree before its time, it is as though he has murdered a soul. (Nahman of Bratslav) [http://tinyurl.com/2x8oqx]
- This prohibition does not apply to trees only. Rather, anyone who breaks utensils, tears garments, destroys buildings, stops up a stream or ruins food with destructive intent transgresses the command, "Do not destroy." (Maimonides' Laws of Kings 6:10) [http://tinyurl.com/yq5oum]

Rabbi Binyomin Adilman explains that recycling has a basis in Jewish tradition. Rather than throw away articles that were used to perform mitzvot, Judaism has always encouraged their reuse. For example, a lulav isn't just thrown away but is kept to be used as fuel to burn the chametz for Passover. An etrog is poked full of cloves and used as the fragrance during the Saturday night havdalah service. The chupah from a wedding ceremony becomes the groom's tallit. Even leftover challah is used to make a kugel for the following Shabbat. Rabbi Adilman suggests that using yahrzeit glasses as drinking glasses should not be considered macabre. Rather, it would be a wonderful way to encourage us to use these objects for another mitzvah as we fill them with a drink and "thank the Creator with an appropriate blessing!" [http://tinyurl.com/25ayes]

I was impressed by MyJewishLearning.com's section on Nature & The Environment. To see how much you know, start off with the deceptively difficult quiz, and then read up on why the story of Genesis is "often blamed for the western world's rapacious attitude toward the natural world." The Guided Learning section takes you through traditional teachings on nature and the environment and then looks at contemporary concerns. [http://tinyurl.com/2fbv6b] Rabbi Fred Scherlinder Dobb has suggestions for Living an Environmentally Conscious Jewish Life. [http://tinyurl. com/2f7pet]

For more stimulating readings, check out How Green Is Judaism? [http://tinyurl.com/28lcan] and Jewish Environmental Values: The Dynamic Tension Between Nature and Human Needs. [http://tinyurl.com/yqfrbc]

Rabbi Yossi Ives says that in the minds of many people environmentalism has been hijacked by "eco-fascists" and that animal welfare has been "discredited in the eyes of many Jews for its hostility to shechita… But these objections, while correct in my view, don't delegitimize the fundamental morality of environmental responsibility and compassion toward animals respectively." Some solutions: "Rabbis can raise the issue in sermons, communal organization could adopt environmentally friendly policies, Jewish charities can invest ethically and individual Jews can buy with a social and ecological conscience." [http://tinyurl.com/2f2r9l]

Next week, greening Israel.

Three students at Ulpanat Orot won $5,000 for Zareinu Educational Centre through a project they undertook as part of their Grade 10 careers class, while a group of their counterparts at Yeshivat Or Chaim won $5,000 for Ve'ahavta the Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee.

The schools – the boys and girls branches of Toronto's Bnei Akiva Schools – represent the only Jewish school to participate thus far in the Youth and Philanthropy Initiative (YPI) run by the Toskan Casale Foundation. The foundation was launched in 2001 by the founders of MAC cosmetics to support community-based grassroots organizations.

YPI dates back to 2002 and is geared to students in Grades 9 and 10. Schools are given a curriculum on philanthropy, and students are required to research a charity, complete a site visit, and prepare a proposal to request funding.

Other charities that Bnei Akiva students researched included rape crisis centres, women's shelters, and services for homeless youth.

"We're saying, 'Go out into the real world,' " said Frank Samuels, principal of the schools.

In terms of the Jewish community, the experience will help students who may "one day determine how federation gives its money," he said.

'They want to help children so badly'

Shari Weinberg, who teaches careers and is also Ulpana's assistant to the principal, introduced the program to the school in February. She told The CJN that students at the school have always been involved in chesed even before community service was mandatory, but the project brought a new dimension, allowing students to research and advocate for many more charities in the GTA.

Students voted on classroom presentations, and finalists made their case in front of a panel of teachers, students and parents at each school.

Melissa Factor, who researched Zareinu with Tova Rosenzweig and Dina Weltman, said she knew about the school before, but "we didn't know what happened behind the doors." What struck her, she said, was how much Zareinu staff accomplish in a limited amount of space. The girls noted in their presentation that therapy takes place in the halls, with privacy provided only by shower curtains.

"They want to help children so badly," said Rosenzweig.

"We were only supposed to spend a few hours, but we ended up staying all day," said Weltman. The girls pitched in to help feed students after a volunteer called the school to cancel.

Akiva Adler, who researched Ve'ahavta with Sean Cohen, Jeremy Segal and David Tradburks, said he realized that "homeless people are not what we think they are." Spending eight hours on the organization's van distributing bagels and coffee to homeless people in the Toronto area, Adler met people who were educated, had people they cared about, and were appreciative of the organization's efforts. "It was very uplifting to see how much Ve'ahavta helps them... Sometimes they just can't function in society."

The students "got a lot out of" researching individual charities, becoming passionate about helping them, and sharing that with their classmates, said Rosenzweig's mother Marcee.

Kates brings love of sports and learning to class

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

"They are our teachers..."

Philip Kates, who has taught at Netivot Hatorah Day School since 1985 – a year after it opened – believes in listening to his students.

After a Grade 5 student told Kates that he and his friends didn't like the exercises they had to do in gym class, Kates who also provides curriculum support and leads Grade 5 students in davening – implemented some of their suggestions.

"I think part of being a teacher is being flexible," he said in a recent interview at the Orthodox school in Thornhill.

The 47-year-old father of two boys, who was born and raised in Toronto, knew from a young age that he wanted to be a teacher.

"I've always loved kids," he said.

In addition to his experience as a day camp counsellor and running junior congregation at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue, Kates was influenced in his career choice by a fellow student who helped him with his Hebrew studies after he switched from public high school to the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto at the beginning of Grade 11. "She was so caring and patient, and I had a thirst for learning," he recalls.

> A lesson from the teacher: "There's no such thing as a 'stupid' question. My philosophy is, 'Always ask.' We can all learn from each other's questions."

Kates majored in religious studies at York University, then earned his B.Ed at the University of Toronto before heading to Israel for a year to study at Bar-Ilan University, in preparation for the career he wanted in Jewish education.

Although he was raised in a traditional Jewish home – he had his bar mitzvah at Beth Emeth – it wasn't until he was a teenager that Kates became shomer Shabbat.

He attributes the change in his observance level both to the influence of his home life and his experience at CHAT. As well, he credits Rabbi Joseph Kelman of Beth Emeth as a role model and influence both in his choice of Jewish lifestyle and career.

Teaching at Netivot has brought together Kates' love of Judaism, kids and sports. "I can't see myself doing anything else," he said.

Years ago, a friend – on learning that Kates planned to go into teaching – joked that he was going to spend his time "babysitting," but Kates was undeterred. "I may not make a lot of money," he said at the time, "but I'll be happy in what I do."

He still feels the same. "I've been blessed. I'm not going to be a millionaire, but I want to make a difference in a child's life."

His father, a retired electrician, and his late mother, a stay-at home mom for most of his growing-up years, were supportive of his choice.

Kates' main goal in remedial work is to allow his students to progress at their own individual levels, he said.

As a gym teacher, it's to get his students moving as much as possible. It's a constant challenge to try to provide the amount of physical activity students need, particularly when so much of their school day is not active, he explained.

"Physical fitness is an important part of my life, and I try to encourage the same in my students," he said. He also encourages them to bring healthy snacks and lunches.

Kates developed an interest in fitness after gaining some weight during his time in Israel as a student. More recently, he has come to enjoy cooking, tinkering with recipes to make them more healthful, with the input of his wife Debbie, a speech pathologist.

Now, with a 10-month-old and a 6-year-old at home, he squeezes in mini-workouts before they wake up.

Is he strict? Kates likes to think of himself as firm but fair – and caring. Over the years, feedback from students confirms that his message has gotten through.

Philip Kates

A boy that he once kicked out of class as a substitute teacher encountered him years later and told him, "Don't worry, I'm behaving myself now."

Another time, he recalls, told a Grade 8 gym class, "You boys have such a tough schedule. You're under such stress. You need your exercise."

"Finally," said one. "A teacher who understands."

Safed musicians in town for fundraiser

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Safed, one of Israel's four holy cities along with Jerusalem, Tiberias and Hebron, needs help.

And organizers in Toronto are staging a fundraising concert to provide it.

A local grassroots assembly of Safed (also known as Tsfat) devotees have arranged for the musical group Simply Tsfat – a fervent trio of Safed-based, Breslev chassidim that includes two guitarists and a violinist – to perform June 6 at Shaarei Tefillah Congregation.

Safed's residents, businesses and tourism industry were devastated by last summer's Lebanon war, and town officials fear there may not be enough funding from the Israeli government to help them over the hump of rebuilding the town's infrastructure and their reputation.

All proceeds from the concert will go to the Nachal Novea Tsfat Fund, a New York-based charity that helps Safed's needy families with interest-free loans, helps stock food banks, maintains holy sites and provides supplemental funding for various rebuilding projects.

The fund is also championed worldwide by Safed's active Breslever Chassidic community.

With more than 27,000 residents, Safed is renowned and revered for its historic, spiritual connection to Jewish mysticism through the teachings of Rabbi Yitzchak Luria and Rabbi Yosef Karo, among others, and for its modern-day charm as a thriving centre for artists, poets and scholars high in the Galilee mountains.

Rhonda Newman, a Toronto nurse enamoured with Safed and its Breslever community, volunteered at Simply Tsfat's Toronto concert last year, and decided to get more involved with the fund as a spokesperson for this year's event.

"The money helps on different levels," Newman told the CJN. "For education, the environment, re-development, and support for entrepreneurs."

Newman added that all of the volunteers involved in this cause feel a great sense of tikkun olam and "a passion to strengthen Israel, our people and our spirit as well."

The charity is also heartily endorsed by Safed's mayor, Yishei Maimon.

"It gives me great pleasure to watch the dynamic energy that [the fund] brings to the city," Maimon wrote in a March 1 letter to Tsfat Fund President Samuel Solomon.

In the past, the fund has helped build nurseries, educational facilities, visitor centres and most recently, a refurbished mikvah that provides access for people with disabilities.

Speaking to The CJN from New York, Michael Landsberg, executive director of the fund, emphasized the extent of Safed's need.

"Tsfat suffered heavy damage [from the war]. The absorption centre for the area's immigrants and many businesses were forced to close," he said. "All the tourist income that was a resource was eliminated. Tens of millions of dollars were lost."

Landsberg also stressed that by helping Safed, people should understand that they're helping "one of the most strategic cities in the north," portraying it as a crucial bulkhead protecting Israel's perimeter in the Galilee.

He added that donors can choose to direct their donations to whatever charitable cause in Safed donors prefer to fund.

Based on her previous experience, Newman believes attendees at this year's concert are in for a treat.

"The essence of Breslev Chassidut is to help everyone," she said. "And Simply Tsfat are amazing. They have a joyful vibe… and you just get this charged feeling at their concerts."

According to Simply Tsfat's website, the group believes in the power of music to help heal their city and the world.

"Judaism is full of song. Even prayer is a song," group members declare in a video on their website.

This year, those songs will ring out once again to help heal Safed.

For concert information, call 416-787-163.

Coverage of Gaza incursion lacks balance

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

As of early last week, most media reports about Israel's renewed but limited military operations in Gaza focused on the impact of the Israel Defence Forces' actions against the Palestinians. Only briefly did they note the reasons for Israel's limited strikes: to stop more Qassam fire on its southern communities.

However, some journalists attempted to provide a more balanced view.

In "Israeli air strike targets Palestinian leadership" (May 21), the Globe and Mail's Mark Mackinnon noted that the IDF's May 20 action, which killed 11 Palestinians, was "in response to unrelenting Palestinian rocket fire targeting the nearby town of Sderot." Mackinnon continued, "Israel's security cabinet authorized intensified strikes on Gaza in an effort to curb the rocket fire."

If there is a sense of imbalance in general, it derives from the decision by many newspapers to accompany stories with prominent wire service photos of Palestinian reactions after Israeli air strikes.

The emotional impact of headlines and imagery cannot be underestimated. Even if an article attempts to provide balance in its text, photos create an overall impression that the Palestinians once again are victims of Israeli aggression. More than 10 per cent of Sderot's population has been forced to flee, while others are being forced to live under a state of siege. There were no photos of Israelis evacuating their homes.

In one week alone, before Israel renewed its military action, more than 150 rockets landed in or around the town, striking homes, schools, and factories. On May 21 a woman was killed when a rocket hit her car near the town centre. On May 22, the Globe reported this fatality under the headline, "One Israeli, five Palestinians killed in attacks," although, in fairness, it did carry a prominent photo of two Israeli women comforting each other.

Intimidation tactics, including kidnappings, mean that very few foreign correspondents are left in Gaza. On the other hand, there are hundreds of journalists free to roam throughout Israel, so they could report more about events in Israel's southern communities.

In the evening of May 21, CTV.ca ran a story about the Israeli fatality in Sderot under the heading "Palestinian rocket kills Israeli woman near Gaza." However, it omitted any account as to why Hamas, Islamic Jihad and other Palestinian groups backed by Hamas persist in their relentless rocket attacks.

Palestinian Authority prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh declared on May 22: "We will keep to the same path until we win one of two goals, victory or martyrdom." In Hamas' mind, victory means the destruction of Israel. If this means sacrificing Palestinians as "martyrs," as suicide bombers, so be it.

This is where the media might focus more attention. But sometimes even that attention can lead to a very one-sided interpretation of events.

On May 18, a BBC anchor interviewed Phyllis Bennis of the Institute for Policy Studies, a left-wing, Washington-based think tank. When Bennis criticized only Israel for the hostilities in Gaza, the anchor raised the key issue: since Israel withdrew unilaterally from Gaza in August 2005, all it has received in return has been rocket attacks.

Bennis showed no sympathy at all for Israel. She maintained that Israel had only redeployed its troops and settlers to maintain its "occupation" of Gaza from the outside, and she implied that only ending Israel's occupation of both Gaza and the West Bank, and allowing the free movement of Palestinians, would lead to tranquility.

Wholly absent was any reference to Hamas' declared aim to carry out its goal of eliminating Israel, because the mere presence of a Jewish state in the Middle East, within any boundaries, is intolerable to Hamas.

revoking his client's citizenship was flawed and he would ask for a judicial review.

"He's not going anywhere. He never will go anywhere," he told the Record.

"I am absolutely livid that the prime minister… of this country will, for political reasons and for political gain, harm a decent, innocent citizen like Oberlander," Hafemann is quoted as saying.

Tony Bergmeier, president of the German-Canadian Congress, said Oberlander "has been an immaculate citizen. Now, in his old age, to prosecute him is just outrageous."

Jewish groups disagreed strenuously.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, rejected suggestions Oberlander was blameless. As a young man, Oberlander served as a translator for Einsatzkommando 10A, a unit that was part of the Einsatzgruppen, mobile killing squads whose only task was to murder Jews. It is estimated they killed more than one million Jews during the Holocaust.

"Everybody, from the cook to the translator to the shooters who participated in the Nazi killing units, bears equal responsibility," Farber said. "He's been here 50 years too long."

Referring to the position of the German-Canadian Congress, Farber said, "We're disappointed they would support a position that would not permit Canada to strip the citizenship of a person who clearly lied about his Nazi past."

Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan discounted Hafemann's suggestion that a judicial review might once again reverse the cabinet decision. "I'm assuming the cabinet [looked at] the Federal Court's decision [in the first revocation] and understands the way to do it properly now," he said.

Morgan, a law professor, said the procedures for deporting someone who obtained citizenship fraudulently are "long and unwieldy."

"The cabinet process is not unfair to the individuals. It's been unfair to the Crown," he said.

Congress "appreciates the government's efforts in making a statement of principle – that these people do not fit Canadian values and should not be among us."

B'nai Brith Canada's senior legal counsel David Matas applauded the government's "principled decision" and urged further action on cases involving Nazi collaborators Wasyl Odynsky, Vladimir Katriuk, Josef Furman and Jura Skomatchuk.

The Globe and Mail reported, however, that Odynsky's family received a two-line letter saying his citizenship would not be revoked and that he would be allowed to remain in Canada. A Canadian Justice Department spokesperson would not confirm this report, citing privacy issues.

Matas called on the government to deport Oberlander and Fast and "to build on this forward momentum by applying the same determined consistency of principle to all Nazi-era cases and to move without further delay to strip the citizenship of the other accused war criminals that have already reached the cabinet stage for review."

Nazi hunter Efraim Zuroff, head of the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Jerusalem office, applauded the revocations and said that "the question is whether or not they will succeed in deporting them from Canada. It's purely a question of political will."

Zuroff has been highly critical of Canada's failure to bring Nazi war criminals to justice, giving the country an "F" in the 2006 Wiesenthal Center's seventh Annual Status Report on the Worldwide Investigation and Prosecution of Nazi War Criminals.

"I am looking forward to the day, and I hope that day will come, that these people are actually deported from Canada," he said last week. "I call on Ottawa to… show there can still be justice at this point."

INTERFAITH WORKERS: Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber, right, appeared on a panel May 20 at the Islamic Society of North America Canada's 33rd annual conference, held May 18 to 20 in Ottawa. Rabbi gives biblical perspective on anti-Semitism

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Jews are hated and resented not because of anything particular that they have done, but because their continued existence poses a threat to the faith of others.

It shows that God has not abandoned them, as Christian and Muslim theology believe He has – or should have, said Rabbi Ephraim Mirvis, the former chief rabbi of Ireland and since 1996 the spiritual leader of the Kinloss Synagogue in London, England.

Rabbi Mirvis was speaking at Shaarei Tefillah Synagogue recently. His lecture, titled "Why the Jews? A Biblical Perspective on Anti-Semitism," was sponsored by the Miriam Alkin Memorial Fund, in association with Shaarei Tefillah and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

He said that he has been approached by an Irish bishop who said that since the establishment of the Jewish state in 1948, his faith has not been the same. He had spent his whole life believing that the suffering of the Jewish people showed that they had been rejected by God for not accepting Jesus as the saviour, with the Holocaust as the final proof of that rejection.

How then, he anguished, can it be that Jews now have a state, that is flourishing?

Along with many others, Rabbi Mirvis said, he recognized that "just our continued existence as believing and practising Jews proves that they are not the chosen people."

This has been so since earliest times, he said. "The Haggadah says that in every generation enemies rise up against us, but God saves us."

The hatred happens regardless of the contribution Jews have made to the economy and well-being of their hosts.

The patriarch Isaac was thrown out of the land of the Philistines because the king was jealous of how successful he was. Later, when Jacob thrived while working for his father-in-law, Laban, Laban's sons accused him of stealing from them. After Jacob and his household fled, Laban chased them to kill them – even though they were already out of the way. "This goes beyond jealousy," Rabbi Mirvis said.

How could it be, he went on, that "in a country where Joseph saved the Egyptian economy during a famine, could a pharaoh arise who knew not Joseph, as the Chumash says?"

The pharaoh, who was in a position to influence the rest of the population, claimed that because the Jewish population was growing so fast, they would join the enemies of Egypt and try to rule the world.

"Echoes of the Protocols of the Elders of Zion," Rabbi Mirvis said dryly.

On the other hand, the rabbi said, the Japanese, with very little exposure to Jews, believed the anti-Semitic diatribes of their Nazi allies but decided they would welcome Jews, on the premise that they would use their wealth to contribute to the Japanese economy and society.

The result of that philosophy was that during World War II many Jewish refugees were allowed to settle in Japanese holdings such as Shanghai and Kobe.

Despite the centuries of persecution and oppression, the Jewish people have survived it all, Rabbi Mirvis said.

"I went to Babi Yar [the site of a massacre of Jews by Nazis and local cohorts in Ukraine]. When I said kaddish, I realized that both the Nazis and the Former Societ Union are dead and buried. But we live on, because HaShem keeps His covenant with us."

One of the things that most bothers the non-Jewish world is that Jerusalem is and always will be the eternal capital of the Jewish people. And the rest of the world can't stand that."

Filmmaker takes heat for film on Jesus

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Though he may be a filmmaker and journalist, Simcha Jacobivici has had lots of practice lately honing his skills as a debater and advocate.

His latest film, The Lost Tomb of Jesus, has caused quite a stir among archeologists, historians and people of faith, and he has been called upon to justify the controversial proposition it sets out – that a first-century Jerusalem crypt discovered in 1980 held the remains of Jesus, his wife Mariamene, his mother and brother.

For Christians who hold as an article of faith that the body of Jesus was physically resurrected on the third day after his crucifixion and ascended to heaven, the documentary is an uncomfortable challenge to a long-cherished belief.

To archeologists, the suggestion that ossuaries – limestone boxes containing human remains – engraved with fairly common names such as Jesus and Joseph belong to the New Testament family, is a leap of logic that's unwarranted by the evidence.

Jacobivici, who also directed the controversial film James, Brother of Jesus, is no stranger to provocative new takes on ancient events. He knows his film is likely to raise the ire of people with settled beliefs. But like an investigator gathering clues, he believes he must follow the trail of evidence and "connect the dots," even if it upsets some people.

Stirring debate is what he's after – although his more unapologetic critics say that he and executive producer James Cameron (of Titanic fame) are after more mundane things, like publicity and cash.

Jacobivici is happy to address those critiques (Don't journalists get paid for what they do? he asks), but he's quite clear in asserting that "our film is very respectful of everybody's faith. I certainly didn't intend to attack anybody's faith.

"What I am doing is reporting objectively about an archeological discovery."

"I'm not a Christian and I'm not a theologian. So my job is not to set out theological issues. I'm a filmmaker and a journalist."

Using dramatizations with actors in period costumes, interviews and DNA and statistical evidence, The Lost Tomb of Jesus certainly makes an arguable case.

Simcha Jacobivici

It recounts the discovery of a tomb hewn out of rock in the Talpiot neighbourhood of south Jerusalem during construction of an apartment building. Archeologists are called in, examine the tomb and find ossuaries that contain the remains of a first-century Jerusalem family. The ossuaries are retrieved and put in storage at the Israel Antiquities Authority (IAA) warehouse while construction resumes on the residential building.

The ossuaries, it turns out, were inscribed with names, including Jesus son of Joseph, Mariamene e Mara, Judah son of Jesus, Maria, Matya and Yose, an fairly uncommon diminutive form of the name Yoseph. Archeologists see the ossuaries as merely typical first-century burial boxes that were in no way connected with historical figures.

A key element in the film is Jacobivici's interview with University of Toronto statistician Andrey Feuerverger, who indicates that while none of the names are unique in themselves, taken together, the odds against duplicating the names of Jesus' family in one tomb are quite remote, something like 600 to 1.

"My point is, it's useless to say names are common," Jacobivici stated. It's the fact they're "clustered" together that's persuasive. Yose is quite unusual, though it appears in a single New Testament passage in referring to Jesus's younger brother. Mariamene, meanwhile, is the Greek form of Mary Magdelene (Mary from Migdal or Magdala) and that's the name used in the Greek Orthodox church to refer to her to this day.

DNA evidence taken from bone fragments in the boxes show Jesus and Mariamene are not related, suggesting they were married. (Had the DNA indicated a blood connection, the premise of the film would have been negated.) And then there's the box of Judah, son of Jesus, suggesting Christianity's founding figure was married with at least one child.

Jacobivici believes the prototypical "reasonable man" of British jurisprudence must conclude that the evidence is overwhelming that the bones discovered in the tomb were those of Jesus and his family.

While many have taken Jacobivici to task for jumping to conclusions, the Toronto filmmaker said that "all in all, the reaction has been positive. There are always people who bring up personal issues, that we want money, publicity that [I'm] a Jew. But nothing bad."

"Millions of people have seen the film now and you always have people who say negative things. That's to be expected."

Feuerverger, for one, has distanced himself from the conclusion that the tomb site "is that of the New Testament family… I now believe that I should not assert any conclusion connecting this tomb with any hypothetical one of the New Testament family."

Amos Kloner, the archeologist who wrote the official report of the finding, has said that the Talpiot tomb is "a typical Jewish burial cave of a large size. The names on the ossuaries are very common names or derivatives of names."

Joe Zias, the IAA's senior curator for anthropology and archeology in Jerusalem, personally numbered the Talpiot ossuaries. In widely reported comments, he stated, "[Simcha] is pimping off the Bible… He got this guy Cameron, who made Titanic or something like that – what does this guy know about archeology? I am an archeologist, but if I were to write a book about brain surgery, you would say, 'Who is this guy?' People want signs and wonders. Projects like these make a mockery of the archeological profession."

When it comes to responding to the critics, Jacobivici gives as well as he gets. "I've noticed that archeology is not a science. It's a body of knowledge," he said.

Furthermore, archeologists generally aren't cross-examined on their assertions the way politicians might be. "I bring the skills of investigative journalism to archeology. My job is to connect the dots, like a detective, and solve a mystery," he said.

Clearly warming to the debate, Jacobivici said there's another element to the work he does.

"For 2,000 years, Jews were an oppressed people. Israel liberated Jews, but we haven't liberated our history. Other people wrote our history, sometimes anti-Semites, and airbrushed us out of history.

"Now, I use my skills to reclaim that history."

He refers to an interview on French radio in which the first question posed to him was, "Why is a Jew doing a Christian story?"

It was as though Jews had nothing to do with the birth of Christianity, he said.

"I'm delving into that part of history written over the last 2,000 years, written by people biased against the Jews and I don't think they reported accurately. So we have to re-examine historical assumptions. I use my skills to reconnect the dots."

The Lost Tomb of Jesus has aired on Vision Canada, the Discovery Channel and Channel 4 in Britain. A companion book, The Jesus Family Tomb, was co-written by Jacobivici and Charles Pellegrino.

Jacobivici, who has directed the documentaries The Exodus Decoded and Falasha: Exile of the Black Jews, is preparing 26 new episodes of the The Naked Archeologist for Vision TV.

Jewish AM radio station starts

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Sid Margles, who worked for 40 years in radio, has taken on in retirement one of the biggest challenges of his career: setting up an all-Jewish content radio station on the AM band in Montreal with virtually no budget and relying almost totally on volunteers.

Radio Shalom, known by the call letters CJRS, officially went on the air the evening of May 5, Lag b'Omer, traditionally the one joyous day between Passover and Shavuot, at 1650AM. The independent, not-for-profit station received CRTC approval in March 2006.

Broadcasting in 60 per cent French, 30 per cent English and 10 per cent Hebrew 24 hours a day, six days a week, Radio Shalom is the only station in North America whose entire programming mix can be described as Jewish.

The content is a blend of news and information, religious and cultural programs, talk shows and music, most of it local and the rest from Israel and France. Nothing is live, however.

The schedule is still being fine-tuned, and Margles continues to look for people who would like to host their own show and, most importantly, can make a firm time commitment – which is not easy when hosts are not being paid, at least not yet.

"We are transforming what was an amateur operation heard on the Internet into a professional operation on AM radio," said Margles, who is a volunteer consultant.

Margles began in radio in the late 1950s as a newsman on CJAD and rose to be general manager of the cross-Canada Standard Broadcast News. He set up and ran its Ottawa affiliate for 10 years.

Radio Shalom is a dream come true for its president, Robert Levy, a Casablanca native who lived in France, where Paris alone has four Jewish radio stations. He began the station in 1999 as a subcarrier of Radio Ville-Marie. Listeners needed a special radio to receive it.

Levy's first application in 2003 to the CRTC for an AM spot was turned down. After modifying the format, he finally received the federal regulatory body's OK last year.

Margles stressed that Radio Shalom is a commercial station and receives no funding or direction from the organized Jewish community. Levy was for many years executive director of the Rabbinat Sépharade du Québec, but the station is not affiliated with it.

The decidedly secular Stan Asher, a retired CEGEP teacher who has been with Radio Shalom since its inception, is in charge of English programming. He brings with him 35 years experience in community radio, plus 10 years as a CBC freelancer.

While the station is religious, as defined in its license, and is off the air on Shabbat and Jewish holidays, Margles said it is not Orthodox as such. He would like the station to have something that appeals to every member of the community and to promote cohesion.

During Shabbat, the station's air time is made available to other communities.

Negev Dinner set for June 12

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Businessman, philanthropist, community leader and Holocaust survivor Arnold Frieman is this year's Jewish National Fund Negev Gala honoree.

At last month's official launch party at the downtown Fairmont Hotel – the gala is scheduled for June 12 at the Centennial Concert Hall – Frieman thanked the JNF for the great honour.

"This is not my honour alone," he said. "I am accepting on behalf of my fellow Holocaust survivors and all those who didn't survive. To survive the Holocaust was miraculous."

Frieman was born in rural Hungary. He recalled in his remarks that he was 10 years old and living with his five brothers and sisters on the November evening in 1938 when the Nazis initiated Kristallnacht. He was 15 in mid-1944 when the Nazis came for his parents and siblings who were still at home. (A couple of older sisters had already left Hungary for Israel.)

"Almost all of my family perished in Auschwitz," he said. "I was a slave labourer until liberation."

Having no reason to stay in Hungary, the angry teenager left his native land after the war for Norway, where he enrolled in an electronics training program. In 1948, he interrupted his schooling to fight for Israel in the War of Independence.

"I was sick of war," he recalled, "but I wasn't going to stand by and let a second Holocaust take place."

After his service in Israel, he returned to Norway to finish his training, and then came to Canada and Winnipeg in 1951 in search of peace and opportunity.

After a few years working for someone else and studying at university, and with the encouragement of his wife and partner, Myra (whom he met at university), he went into business for himself.

He has since built Advance Electronics into one of the major independently owned electronics retailers in Canada.

Frieman is also a generous philanthropist who never says no to a charitable cause.

The national co-chairs of the 2007 gala are retired Canadian Armed Forces generals Alan MacKenzie and Ray Crabbe.

The funds raised at the gala will be used to send to Israel 500 children of Canadian military personnel who have served in Afghanistan. The children will be billeted with Israeli families. As well, 500 to 700 seats at the gala – about 2,000 people are expected to attend – are to be set aside for members of the Canadian military and their families.

In addition to Crabbe and MacKenzie, the local co-chairs working on the fundraising aspects of the gala are Gail Asper, Mel Lazareck, Brian Scharfstein and Larry Vickar.

The honoree and the JNF 2007 Negev Gala campaign team were introduced by Graham Dixon, JNF's president for the Prairie region and also a former Canadian Armed Forces officer.

The entertainment this year will be provided by Israeli singing sensation Rita.

The individual will have strong communication skills as he or she will communicate directly with all stakeholders. Central to the role would be clerical skills and a good working knowledge of Microsoft Office. Familiarity with database programs is an asset.

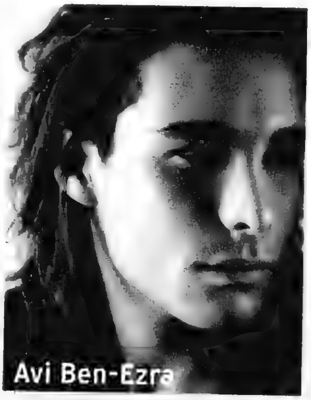
Dating guru helps others

By Abigail Bimman
CJN Intern



Avi Ben-Ezra

If you have trouble figuring out just what women want, Avi Ben-Ezra says he can help you.

He released his first book, Modern World Dating: How to Meet and Date Women, a few months ago, and runs an accompanying website, www.modernworlddating.com.

Sure, skeptics can point out that he's only 22. But the dating coach has spent the last five years working on the skills he says are crucial to meeting and dating great women.

"It started out more with personal growth, getting over certain fears of approaching people and speaking to people," he says. "Personally, I wanted to get better at it."

First he read and learned everything he could get his hands on about dating, and then he put his education into action.

"I completely changed my life," he says. "I started dating many women; I started having girlfriends. The way I was acting changed, the way I was thinking changed – everything kept moving forward and I couldn't believe it."

Self-described as "made in Israel and born in Canada," Ben-Ezra grew up in Toronto. He studied fitness and health promotion at Humber College and worked as a personal trainer at the Jewish Community Centre for a year and a half. He's also had a full roster of odd jobs, from construction to window and door sales calls to modelling.

Ben-Ezra has modelled since the age of 19. He has done print jobs, commercials and runway shows. In Israel, he worked for Image Models and Elite, and in Canada, Stylus.

But he most enjoys helping others in what he calls the fast-paced, modern dating world.

"I know how it feels to need the help," he says.

Ben-Ezra spent his teenage years between Israel and Canada, as his mother lived in Toronto and his father outside of Haifa. While Ben-Ezra preferred Toronto, his mother Edie's death from cancer when he was 14 prompted his move to Israel to live with his father, Shlomi.

He says the death of his mother, the shock of living in a new country and being the new kid in school spun him into a "deep depression."

For the two years that he lived with his father, he says, he rarely left his basement bedroom and his computer. "It was like a little dungeon and I would never leave."

At 16, he decided to move back to Toronto and live with his aunt and uncle. While he was happier in Canada, he still wasn't a dating superstar.

"I thought I was different or I wasn't normal in the beginning. Because I'm better-than-average looking by society's standards, I thought that something must have been wrong with me. Even though I'm considered good looking, I still couldn't meet and date women," he says.

But eventually he was able to turn this trend around. The Internet is key to dating in the modern world, as well as to his own success.

"The Internet played a huge role in my learning and being able to meet so many women in such a short period of time," he says.

The first dating site he signed up to was ratemybody.com, and from there, he tried many more, both paid and unpaid.

WATCH FOR THE HEEBONICS LAUNCH

"It just kind of became really easy and kind of like booking appointments."

He never planned to write a book or run a coaching service, he says, but he enjoyed helping other friends with their dating issues once he became more experienced. He is so confident in his services that he offers a lifetime, money-back guarantee, something he says his competitors will not do.

Ben-Ezra often gets asked for his "biggest secret," and says that dating answers aren't that simple.

"I could say, 'Be a real man,' but it's much more complicated than people think. I don't want to waste my time on giving people little tips, I'd rather just give them everything and get them to read my book," he says. "Everything's in there from A to Z."

Ben-Ezra says that, for the short term, he is focused on getting the word out about his book and promoting his website. Eventually, he wants to hold dating seminars. In five years, he says he can see himself writing another book about how to maintain a relationship.

He is done with the dating phase of his life, he says, and is looking to explore more serious relationships. For him, Judaism will play a role in that future.

"I definitely want to keep religion in my life, for my future and my kids when I get married. That's something important to me."

Having dated both non-Jewish and Jewish girls, Ben-Ezra says that deep down, everyone is ultimately similar.

"When you get down to the deep things of what women want, I think it doesn't matter what religion you are or what language you speak," he says. "It's kind of like a universal language of love."

גידי קורן וחברים

תודה לכל אלה שברכו אותי על הפרס ההומאניטרי שקיבלתי מידי מרכז חב"ד במהלך ה- Spirit of the Community Dinner למי שהורגל בפרסים על הישגים ותגליות רפואיים-היה משהו מרגש לזכות בהכרה על מעשים למען הקהילה.

כה אמר רבנו
רבנו רבי עקיבא:
"שמרו נפשותיכם
בכל מצוה ומצוה.
יש תרי"ג מצוות
ועשרת הדיברות
אבל כל התורה
מקופלת באמרה:

ואהבת לרעך כמוך
זהי כל התורה

שמרו תרי"ג מצוות.
אמר רבי עקיבא,
אך בלי אהבה לרעהו
המצוה אינה שלמה.
על שנאת חינם
בית המקדש [illegible]
וכל התורה
מקופלת באמרה:
ואהבת לרעך כמוך....

מאיפה הגיע "פעם שלישית גלידה"?

Third time I'll scream

Jewish group offers locally grown organic produce

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Consumers can buy a 'vegetable share'

Torat HaTeva, an organization dedicated to promoting ecological awareness, has teamed up with Everdale Farm, in Hillsburgh, west of Toronto, to provide the Jewish community with locally and organically grown fruit and vegetables.

Ahuva Goldshmidt, Torat HaTeva's executive director, said the initiative is first of its kind for a Canadian Jewish community.

Consumers can buy a "vegetable share," ranging in price from $14 to $48 a box, depending on size. They can pick and choose the vegetables they want, and the box size can be upgraded or downgraded as needed throughout the 20-week season, which begins in early June.

People interested in a "fruit share" must be part of the vegetable program, and they can expect to receive from four to seven types of fruit each week. In order to keep fruit prices low, there is no picking and choosing, Goldshmidt said.

All orders can be picked up Thursdays at the First Narayever Congregation, 187 Brunswick Ave., just north of Harbord Street.

Goldshmidt said that because the farmers come to the depot, consumers can meet the people who harvest their food.

Buying local and organic food, said Goldshmidt, "makes us not just good people, but good Jews. In Genesis, humans are commanded to serve and protect our earth. By committing to local, organic produce with all its health, environmental and social justice advantages, we are helping to fulfil our divinely given role as stewards of the earth."

She said that by committing to purchase an entire season of produce, consumers are "putting their fate with the fate of the farm. They are sharing their burden."

Goldshmidt added that Torat HaTeva has received $10,000 in grants from Evergreen, an organization whose mission is to bring communities and nature together, and the Shell Environmental fund to create its own organic garden next spring at the Lebovic Jewish Community Campus in Vaughan.

"Our mission is to create a strong connection to the idea of sustainability in the Jewish community."

Winnipeg community celebrates Yom Yerushalayim

By RHONDA SPIVAK
Special to the CJN

WINNIPEG — The Jewish community here celebrated Yom Yerushalayim and the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem with a spirited gala performance of dance and song featuring Hora Jerusalem.

Hora Jerusalem is a professional dance troupe made up of 19 dancers, ages 17 to 27, all of whom live in Jerusalem.

They were joined on stage by the local Sarah Sommer Chai folk ensemble (Chai), a non-professional volunteer dance group.

An audience of close to 2,000 people at the Centennial Concert Hall watched the performance, which was presented by Chai and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg

"This is the first time I have ever done a joint show with a separate company that is half way around the world. It turned out even better than I imagined," said Shai Gottesman, artistic director and choreographer of Hora Jerusalem.

"For this kind of production, after a year of planning between two dance companies with the same style of dancing, building a show like this was an amazing thing," he said. "I choreographed dances for Hora Jerusalem and we practised in Jerusalem, and the dancers in Winnipeg practised, and then we came to Winnipeg one week prior to the show.

"We were scared. They were scared. We worked very hard… The two companies danced together for six hours a day, we had differences in technique, as our company is more professional…but it all came together and was great."

Gottesman, who has been with Hora Jerusalem since 1995, first learned of Winnipeg's Chai Folk ensemble in 1998 at Festival Aviv in Mexico, where his troupe and Chai both performed. The two groups have shared a long-distance relationship for nine years, and Gottesman has previously choreographed some works for Chai.

Tracy Kasner Greaves, Chai's artistic director, said the opportunity to perform with Hora Jerusalem "is a milestone for us."

Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's Toronto-based consul general for Ontario and Western Canada attended the event, as did Manitoba Lieut.-Gov. John Harvard.

Shir Choter, a 17-year-old dancer with Hora Jerusalem, said after the performance, that "we'll all be better dancers because of this [exchange]… It was the most exciting thing to come to Winnipeg and be aware of the Chai dancers and to see how you are being Jewish and having a living Judaism here."

Asli Bagil, a male dancer with Hora Jerusalem, added, "This concert and our visit here was amazing. We came and met youth our own age, and we formed new relationships… and we are being billeted by Jewish families here."

Chai dancer Cara Katz said that the experience "was so fun. There was so much new energy. We learned better technique. I'm sure the connection between the two groups will continue."

Fellow Chai dancer Hillary Nepon, added that the event was "awesome. I'm hosting two dancers from Jerusalem. This is such a special experience to meet them."

Hora Jerusalem also performed a different program of pieces at Winnipeg's Berney Theatre and gave performances for students at Shore Elementary School and Brock Corydon School. The dancers were also special guests at a community-wide Shabbat dinner at the Rady Jewish Community Centre.

Outgoing WJC head Bronfman speaks out

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — Amid the whirlwind of controversy that has surrounded the World Jewish Congress, Edgar Bronfman has remained largely silent since announcing he will resign his presidency effective June 10.

In his first comments to the media since disclosing his plans to the WJC's steering committee May 7, Bronfman spoke with JTA via e-mail about his past with the WJC, his future without it and what he expects from the organization moving forward.

"It will be up to new leadership to chart a forward path for the WJC. It will be up to them to determine what role they should play and how to perform it," said Bronfman, 76. "But communities are not static – they change constantly. They diminish. They grow. Population and attitudes change. We live in a time of challenge, no doubt. But this also is an era of remarkable innovation and entrepreneurship."

Bronfman became interim WJC president in 1979 and president in 1981. During his reign, the group played an instrumental role in the Soviet Jewry movement, often negotiating behind the scenes with Soviet leaders. It helped expose former Austrian president Kurt Waldheim's Nazi past, and during the 1990s, it helped win billions of dollars in Holocaust restitution money from European governments and banks.

Observers say Bronfman brought a personal flamboyance and financial clout that helped the WJC obtain the meetings with world leaders that helped it flourish in the 1980s and 1990s.

"Thirty years ago, the challenge was to stabilize the WJC, clarify its mission and grow its membership," Bronfman told JTA. "We made quick progress on those fronts and were able to play a major role in some of the most important Jewish events on the world stage."Among his favourite memories, Bronfman said, was telling then-Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Shamir "that Soviet foreign minister Eduard Shevardnadze agreed to lift the ban on teaching Hebrew and allow Russian Jews to worship and live their lives as Jews openly and with dignity."

Edgar Bronfman

Bronfman, who met with Pope John Paul II, said he was proud as well of the WJC's efforts to improve relations between Jews and the Catholic Church.

Despite its successes during Bronfman's tenure, the WJC appears in peril after four years of probes into the group's finances, which have bogged down the organization.

The last five years have taken a toll on the WJC, damaging its credibility and apparently its fundraising ability. A recent WJC report showed that its fundraising was down by 33 per cent during the first quarter of 2007. Bronfman leaves amid questions about the organization's role going forward.

Without the restitution battle as its focus, the WJC of late has taken up the fight against anti-Semitism, with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad as its key target. But critics say that mantle is already worn by bodies such as the Anti-Defamation League, the American Jewish Committee and the Israeli government.

The WJC has little or no power in the United States and Israel, where some 80 per cent of world Jewry lives. Still, supporters say the organization plays a more critical role in Europe and Latin America. They also say it's the only body that convenes Jewish leaders from every region of the Jewish world.

"I don' t believe that the work of defending Jewish communities and helping them raise their voice in world councils will ever end," Bronfman said. "The focus and tactics might shift with the times, and they should. But the work continues."

The controversy surrounding the WJC and the saga of Rabbi Israel Singer, the former chairman of the WJC' s policy board, have also taken a personal toll on Bronfman.

Rabbi Singer was entangled in an investigation by the New York state attorney general into the WJC's finances that focused on his transferring $1.2 million (US) of WJC money into a Swiss bank account. The attorney general didn't accuse Rabbi Singer of any illegalities, but he was prevented from taking further financial duties at WJC.

Bronfman fired Rabbi Singer in March, alleging financial impropriety, including new documentation from February 2002 that he tried to transfer $1.5 million of WJC money into a non-WJC Swiss bank account.

Bronfman said the firing was difficult after he had worked closely with Rabbi Singer during his nearly 30 years as WJC president. Bronfman had also spent the past several years defending Rabbi Singer.

"My mistake was in trusting Israel Singer to the extent that I did," Bronfman told JTA. "I am extremely saddened and disappointed that the investigations of the WJC by the office of the New York state Attorney General led unavoidably to Israel Singer and thus to his termination."

Rabbi Singer's supporters say he did nothing improper and that it was a shock Bronfman turned against his former lieutenant.

"Regardless of what Mr. Bronfman may now be saying, the decades-long relationship of Bronfman and Singer produced incalculable dividends for the Jewish people," a spokesman for Rabbi Singer, Hank Sheinkopf, told JTA via e-mail. "Though he sings a different tune now, Bronfman unstintingly supported Singer throughout the attorney general's inquiry from onset to conclusion."

Bronfman said "the biggest challenge was to preserve the integrity of the WJC and its good name. I am heartened that this period of the WJC is now over and I am looking forward to seeing a new generation take over the leadership."

Since Bronfman announced his retirement, a power struggle has been developing involving the chair of the WJC's executive, Mendel Kaplan; Ronald Lauder, president of the Jewish National Fund; and Bronfman's son Matthew.

Though some speculate Matthew Bronfman is interested in a position of power with the WJC that could eventually lead him to the presidency, it remains unclear if he wants to become WJC president, now or ever.

It's also not clear what Edgar Bronfman's financial involvement with WJC, which has been estimated at $2 million (US) per year, would be in the future.

Bronfman would not speculate about his family's future with the organization.

"Right now is too soon to say," he said.

Associates said that when Bronfman takes a step back from the WJC, he will focus on the work of his Samuel Bronfman Foundation, of which he is president. The family foundation helped revive Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, and founded the Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel, which takes 26 high school students to Israel each summer for a five-week leadership program.

It also supports a number of Jewish programs, such as STAR (Synagogues: Transformation and Renewal), Brooklyn Jews, Myjewishlearning.com and BIMA: The Berkshire Institute for Music and Arts.

"My goals remain the same as they've always been. I want to see Judaism thrive and prosper from both the political and cultural standpoints," Bronfman said in his e-mail. "I'm particularly interested in helping to foster a style of Judaism that is open and inclusive and that makes it possible for all Jews to explore their heritage in ways that are meaningful and positive.

"We've been doing a great a deal of work along those lines at The Samuel Bronfman Foundation, developing and supporting programs that encourage Jewish learning and community building," he said. "I will continue to focus my energies on those activities."

Qassams continue to fall on Sderot

SDEROT — At least eight Qassam rockets struck Sderot on Monday, one landing as Defence Minister Amir Peretz turned out in his western Negev hometown to vote in the Labor party primaries.

Two rockets struck Sunday evening, damaging a house in the city. It was the third salvo of the day, and came after a man from Hod Hasharon, a suburb of Tel Aviv, was killed by a rocket while driving.

Another Israeli killed

Oshri Oz, 35, was killed when a rocket landed near his car. The Qassam that killed Oz was preceded by an alert. An eyewitness, a career army man, said he signalled to Oz to stop, but Oz just waved and drove on. The eyewitness said Oz got out of his car after the explosion, walked a few steps and collapsed.

State Comptroller Micha Lindenstrauss and Knesset State Control Committee members visited Sderot on Sunday. They criticized the poor planning and construction of protected spaces in schools. Members of the Israel Manufacturers Association were also in the town Sunday, touring industrial facilities in the wake of reports that many employees have not been showing up for work, in many cases due to lack of proper protection.

The evening salvo came moments after the Israel Air Force fired missiles at a Hamas military position along the coast of southern Gaza, as part of expanding efforts to curb the rocket fire.

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert signed an order recognizing Sderot and locales within an eight-kilometre radius of Gaza as "frontier" communities. The order also includes the southern industrial zone of Ashkelon, Sapir Academic College and area farms, gas stations and tourism facilities. Such recognition will allow businesses to receive compensation for indirect damages, retroactive to May 16, when the Qassam bombardments began.

The Knesset Finance Committee is expected to approve the order, which will remain in effect at least until the end of August.

As of Monday, more than 250 rockets had been fired at Sderot.

Marriage breakup and RESPs

Family Matters

Question. I might be separating from my husband of 12 years. We have two children, ages 10 and 12.

During the course of our marriage, I have been saving some money in an RESP for my children's post-secondary education. If we end up separating, how do I protect my children's education fund? I am ready to give up everything except my children's fund.

Answer. A Registered Education Savings Plan is a type of savings account that grows tax free until a child is ready for post-secondary education. RESPs are a good way to save for a number of reasons: the money grows tax free until the child needs it for tuition, residence and other educational expenses, and an RESP allows you to apply for the Canada Education Savings Grant on your child's behalf.

Until recently you could contribute up to $4,000 per year in an RESP, but the Harper government very recently removed the limit in the last budget. If only you have signing authority, then you'll have no worries.

The funds belong to the children. You are the "caretaker" of those funds, nothing more, nothing less.

They are reserved for post-secondary purposes and can only be released to the educational financial institution for those purposes unless your child never goes to any post-secondary school.

If that should happen, the contributor can, under certain circumstances, transfer the funds to their RRSP after 26 years or even withdraw the funds, minus the grants that had been received from the federal government.

If your spouse has signing authority then the worst that can happen is that he releases the funds for some educational institution with which you do not agree or if your children never use the funds for post-secondary purposes, your spouse could theoretically transfer the funds into his RRSP or even withdraw the funds under certain severe restrictions and deductions.

The safest strategy is to ensure that you are the sole contributor to the RESP and that the financial institution clarifies that only you have the power to apply the funds to the educational institution concerned, and that if there will never be such an institution only you can apply to transfer the funds to your RRSP or withdraw the funds.

Alternatively, many couples simply agree in their separation agreements to share responsibility for managing and applying RESP funds such that all decisions in respect of such savings could continue to be made. Why? Well, in many cases both parents contributed so the sharing of the RESP can continue.

Labor party election could shake up Israeli gov't

By MAZAL MUALEM
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The polls opened in the Labor party primary at 8:30 a.m. Monday, in an election that could have far-reaching effects for the government.

One of the leading candidates, Ami Ayalon, has said that he would not remain in the coalition under Prime Minister Ehud Olmert if he is elected party chief.

Some senior Labor officials oppose a pullout from the ruling coalition. But should the 19-member Labor faction bolt, Olmert could be forced to seek support from religious or far-right parties. It could also renew pressure on Olmert to resign.

About 104,000 people were registered to vote in the Monday ballot. Polls closed at 9 p.m. (local Israeli time). The initial results were expected by 10:30 p.m., and final results were due about four hours later. By the afternoon, the voter turnout had reached 25 per cent, an unusually high figure for a primary election.

Ehud Barak and Ayalon, whom polls showed to be running neck and neck, were both hoping to win the primaries without having to compete in a second-round runoff.

Members of both camps said they thought they could win in the first round, but many observers expected the vote to be so split among the five candidates running that none of them would get the minimum 40 per cent for victory, making a second round necessary. A second round would take place on June 12.

The latest polls showed that neither Barak, a former prime minister, nor Ayalon, a former Shin Bet security chief, had reached the 40-per cent threshold.

Peretz, who voted Monday in his hometown of Sderot, said "every ballot that goes to Amir Peretz is one step closer to the Finance Ministry and progress in the social revolution," referring to the platform upon which he was elected as party chair 18 months ago.

Peretz has said he will leave the post of defence minister, in the wake of the fierce criticism levelled at him over the handling of the Second Lebanon War.

Peretz said Monday he believed "that through the vote, party members will prove that what they want is stability."

Barak, voting in Kfar Sava, echoed Monday his previous warning that only he can emerge victorious from a face-off with Likud leader Benjamin Netanyahu.

"I am telling the voters two things today: think hard about who you want more in times of war. Only I, at the head of this large beehive of a party, can beat Netanyahu. I have a very good feeling this morning."

In the last few days, Barak and Ayalon have been targeting the kibbutz vote and the Arab vote, which are expected to determine the elections. Ayalon is seen as having a slight lead over Barak among kibbutz members, which has led Barak to focus his last-minute efforts in this sector.

Barak emphasized his two messages: "Think about who you want more in a time of war" and "Only I will beat Bibi" – a reference to Netanyahu.

Ayalon has been telling Labor members that they should vote for him because Labor under his leadership would win more seats if a national election was held than it would under Barak.

The Prime Minister's Office is keeping an eye on the primaries because the results are expected to affect the fate of the Olmert government, since the Labor party, under its new leadership, will have to decide whether to stay in the government.

Barak aides said Monday that if he wins, he will work to bring together the other candidates: Ayalon, Ophir Pines-Paz, Danny Yatom and Peretz.

Former prime minister Barak has the support of cabinet ministers from Labor. Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, Isaac Herzog and Shalom Simhon made dozens of calls Sunday to try to convince Labor members to vote for him.

Ayalon also spent much of Sunday on the phone, repeating his message that he does not plan to sit in a government led by Ehud Olmert.

Peretz said he was optimistic he would again emerge victorious in the primaries. "There are some who want to take away from us the social revolution we began," Peretz said in a recorded message to his supporters. "When we win once again, we will demand the Finance Ministry and, from there, continue the social revolution we're dreaming of."

Peretz's tenure as party chairman has been overshadowed by his role as the defence minister during the Second Lebanon War. However, Peretz insisted that his supporters will give him a surprise victory and lashed out against Barak: "We all know the truth, that Ehud Barak was not a successful defence minister.

"He set mistaken concepts for which we paid a price – the unilateral withdrawal from Lebanon and a small and smart army."

As the candidates and their staff were immersed in campaigning, reports circulated about attempts to buy votes. The Ayalon camp said on Sunday it had been offered Arab-sector votes for money, but no official complaint has been filed. Yatom vehemently denied a rumour that he received an offer to have his campaign costs covered if he were to withdraw his candidacy.

Israel Briefs

Iran threatens Israel

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad warned Israel not to mount a new offensive in Lebanon. Apparently responding to current fighting in Gaza and speculation that Israel could go to war against Lebanese Hezbollah and Syria in the coming months, Ahmadinejad said May 24: "If you think that by bombing and assassinating Palestinian leaders you are preparing the ground for new attacks on Lebanon in the summer, I tell you that you are seriously wrong. If this year you repeat the same mistake of the last year, the ocean of nations of the region will get angry and will uproot the Zionist regime," Ahmadinejad told a rally in the Iranian city of Isfahan, referring to last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah. In fact, many Sunni Arabs at first backed Israel's attacks on Hezbollah, a Shiite militia sponsored by Iran, and have since stepped up peace overtures toward Jerusalem.

Hamas threatens U.K. firm

Hamas attacked a British energy company for pursuing a deal to develop a natural gas field off the Gaza coast. Ziad Thatha, the Hamas economic minister, told the Times of London that any agreement on the gas is equivalent to a modern-day Balfour Declaration, the 1917 British government statement that pledged support for a Jewish state. "When a company sells Palestinian gas to the Zionist occupation, it is similar to acts of theft the Israelis are practising against our land every day," Thatha said. Talks over the gas deal were due to begin this week. Israel's Foreign Ministry said it's hoping to conclude a deal "as soon as possible."

Nobel winner cancels visit

Israeli newspapers reported that a Nobel prize-winning physicist cancelled a visit to a London university over what he says is widespread anti-Israel sentiment in Britain. Steven Weinberg, a professor at the University of Texas at Austin, cancelled an appearance at London's Imperial College in July, the Guardian reported. "I know that some will say that these boycotts are directed only against Israel, rather than generally against Jews," Weinberg wrote in a letter explaining the cancellation. "But given the history of the attacks on Israel and the oppressiveness and aggressiveness of other countries in the Middle East and elsewhere, boycotting Israel indicated a moral blindness for which it is hard to find any explanation other than anti-Semitism." A spokesperson for Imperial said it was "very sad" about the professor's decision. Weinberg, who won the Nobel prize for physics in 1979, cancelled a 2006 appearance at the University of Durham for similar reasons.

Hamas politicians arrested

The Israeli army and the Shin Bet security service last week arrested 33 members of Hamas' political wing in the West Bank. The move was part of a broad offensive against Hamas in response to rocket barrages on southern Israel. The last time Israel arrested Hamas politicians was June 2006, after Hamas kidnapped Cpl. Gilad Shalit to Gaza in a cross-border raid. –from JTA and Ha'aretz

Fire damages Geneva synagogue

JTA

GENEVA — A large fire damaged the Hekhal Haness Synagogue in Geneva on May 24, the second day of Shavuot, and police are investigating whether the blaze was arson.

The fire erupted about 5 a.m. and no one was injured, although about one third of the synagogue, built in 1972 and attended mostly by Sephardi Jews with Middle Eastern and North African roots, was blackened by smoke. It took 40 firefighters one hour to put out the flames.

Police initially reported that the fire was a criminal act, but several hours later they announced that an electrical fault might have caused the fire. The police investigation, which was to continue over the weekend, used specially trained dogs to sniff out any explosives that might have been used.

> Police initially reported that the fire was a criminal act but said later that an electrical fault might be the cause

Johanne Gurfinkel, secretary general of the Geneva-based Intercommunity Coordination against Anti-Semitism and Defamation, which monitors anti-Semitism in the French-speaking cantons of Switzerland, said police discovered that the fire began next to a circuit-breaker.

"The police are leaving the door open to any possibility and we are being very careful not to jump to conclusions," Gurfinkel said. "Of course people in the community are worried, some think it could be terrorism or someone even mentioned Kristallnacht, but there is no evidence yet that can tell us anything."

There are 5,000 to 6,000 Jews and six synagogues in Geneva. Gurfinkel said there were no local tensions between Muslims and Jews and that there was no noticeable increase in anti-Semitism in recent years.

Israeli discovery could provide low-cost fuel

By ILANA TEITELBAUM
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — The fact former U.S. vice-president Al Gore's documentary An Inconvenient Truth has become one of the top-grossing documentaries of all time shows that concern for global warming is widespread.

Carbon emissions, produced by motor vehicles, are the leading cause of global warming, and the quest for alternative fuels is now a hot topic worldwide.

Now, Israeli researcher Amir Sharon of Tel Aviv University has discovered a transgenic fungus strong enough to convert even the most resilient plant parts into bioethanol, a chemical used for biofuel.

Strengthened with an anti-death gene, this fungus is resistant to harsh conditions such as heat and toxic substances, both of which are released while converting plant biomass into ethanol. As a result, the production of ethanol using this transgenic fungus could be much more efficient than with conventional fungi.

Biofuel – fuel derived from plant biomass – has emerged as one of the most viable alternatives to oil. The U.S. bioethanol industry is booming: in 2006, 13 per cent of the U.S. corn crop was used to produce ethanol.

But there are drawbacks to biofuel's production – it's expensive and wasteful. Most bioethanol produced in the United States is derived from the edible parts of corn crops. The stalks and leaves – made of cellulose and known to scientists as cellulosic biomass – are much harder to convert into ethanol.

Dr. Amir Sharon says using plants for fuel doesn't damage the environment because plants recycle carbon dioxide, releasing the same molecule they've already absorbed.

The cellulose is bound with a chemical called lignin, which causes the plant material to be rigid and difficult to break down. Consequently the production of bioethanol from cellulosic biomass is not carried out on an industrial scale in the United States.

As a result, some grain crops that could be used for food production are being used for fuel production instead. The prevailing criticism is that there is not enough farmland to produce crops for biofuel and still maintain an adequate supply of food. Additionally, Americans consume about 400 million gallons of gasoline per day, and that figure is growing. Bioethanol only provides 70 per cent of the energy contained in a tank of gas.

However, Sharon's new fungus, with its capability to convert inedible plant cellulose into ethanol, could have a significant impact on ethanol production.

According to Sharon, fungus is normally very difficult to culture.

"It is spoiled. Fungus needs very specific conditions in which to thrive. These transfungi are much more resistant to stress conditions, even oxidant chemicals like hydrogen peroxide or UV radiation, which usually harms the DNA and causes mutations, has little effect on the new transfungi," he said.

New fungus may have a significant impact on ethanol production

How does this apply to the production of ethanol? Since fungi require specific conditions for survival, the stressful conditions produced during the conversion process eventually kill the fungi.

"When you apply the fungus to the plant material, degradation will release heat and toxic material, which usually kills it. But this transgenic fungus is more tolerant, so it can withstand heat and toxins, making the plant degradation process more efficient," Sharon said.

Sharon discovered the unique properties of this fungus by accident.

"We were exploring ways to modify the germination of the fungus using anti-death genes… about a year later, when we went to clean out the cold room, we were astonished to discover a bright fungal colony that should have died months before."

The unusual hardiness of the fungus may also be important for the food and drug industries, which rely on the process of fermentation. More than 20 drugs, including penicillin, require fungi in the manufacturing process.

"Our fungus can grow for much longer in the fermenter – twice as long or more," Sharon said. "This can allow for the production of many more fermentation units."

Doubling the efficiency of food and drug manufacture could mean significant cost savings for these industries.

According to David Zaks, an American expert on environmental issues and a contributor to the popular website Worldchanging, Sharon's research bodes well for future cellulose conversions.

"This research is definitely an important step in providing the technology needed to do [the conversion of cellulose] on a more industrial scale. In the future we'll be able to do it with things like switchgrass," said Zaks, a graduate student at the University of Wisconsin, Madison's Center for Sustainability and the Global Environment.

Zaks predicts cellulosic ethanol will be the next big thing.

"There are many different small-scale production companies that are going to be working on it," he said. "There's a lot of money being put into this field right now to make it an important part of our energy future."

Sharon also sees biofuel as an important alternative to fossil fuels, both to prevent global warming and to supplement the world's supply of fuels.

"When we use plants [for biofuel] we're not damaging the environment because we're recycling carbon dioxide, releasing the same molecule that plants have already absorbed," he said.

"We also need alternatives because in 30 or 40 years, we'll have used up our supply of petrol."

Irit Ben Chlouch, director of business development at Ramot, Tel Aviv University's technology transfer company, realizes the financial implications of Sharon's findings.

"Not even mentioning biofuels, the fungal biotechnology market, which includes drugs, enzymes and the food market, is estimated at more than $100 billion (US) a year," she said.

Ben Chlouch added that Ramot is in talks with several companies to develop and commercialize Sharon's breakthrough technology.

"We are not at liberty to disclose the names [of the companies] until a final agreement has been reached," she said.

Hyperbaric chamber may help avoid amputations

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Three hyperbaric oxygen therapy chambers in the recently opened Judy Dan Wound Care Centre may be able to help people with diabetic wounds avoid amputations, says Dr. Ron Linden.

Linden, medical director and CEO of Ontario Wound Care Inc. and a specialist in hyperbaric medicine for over 17 years, also has a family practice and is a staff physician in the hyperbaric unit of Toronto General Hospital.

High sugar concentrations in those with diabetes, he said, damage the nerves, especially in the legs. Blood vessels in the capillaries of the legs and feet are also damaged.

"Circulation is impaired, and not enough blood or oxygen goes to the feet. Cells that fight infection and allow healing don't get enough oxygen and so can't do their job."

The result, he said, is that those with diabetes, particularly when it is not controlled by medication, diet and exercise, can't feel when their feet are injured – for example, if they step on a nail. Antibiotics can't get to the site because of the poor circulation, and the wound festers.

"When the infection reaches the bone, that's the time for amputation," Linden said.

Patients who use the hyperbaric chambers spend two hours, five days a week, usually for 30 treatments, breathing 100 per cent oxygen. Linden explained that in the chambers, the atmospheric pressure is twice as high as it is in room air.

"The blood cells absorb oxygen, and the serum [the liquid fluid of the blood], which is also saturated with oxygen, carries it to the wound."

Martin Necpal, a certified hyperbaric technologist who is hyperbaric safety director at Toronto General Hospital, is constantly in the treatment room and monitors each chamber. There is an intercom, so that the patient and Necpal can communicate with each other.

While one might think this is a rather claustrophobic experience, Linden said that doesn't seem to be much of a problem, although Ativan, an anti-anxiety medication is sometimes given. Patients can listen to music, watch television or a movie, or even have a nap.

Care must be taken to prevent sparks. The patient must wear all-cotton underwear and is given an all-cotton scrub suit and hair covering to wear. All jewelry is banned, as are cellphones, laptops and personal digital devices such as Blackberries and Palm Pilots.

Results of hyperbaric oxygen therapy have been very encouraging, Linden said, with a 75 per cent rate in healing wounds and thus making amputation unnecessary. Studies in other countries where the technique is used, including the United States, Australia, Japan, China, Israel and Russia, show the same results.

Toronto businessman and philanthropist Aubrey Dan donated $350,000 for the funding of the capital costs of the centre, in memory of his mother, the late Judy Dan, who fought Type 1 diabetes from the age of 18 and had a series of amputations prior to her death.

Operating costs, however, are not covered by the initial donation, or by OHIP. Linden lamented that, although Health Canada considers it an essential medical service for 13 conditions including osteomyelitis, decompression and carbon monoxide poisoning, OHIP won't pay for it because no double-blind studies have been carried out. (It does pay him for supervising the treatment.)

On the other hand, the Canada Health Act forbids the patient to pay for it because of the ban on private health care.

The centre, then, is dependent on private donations. A double blind study is tentatively scheduled, with the help of PATH, the Program for the Assessment of Technology and Health.

The facility can treat 120 patients a year, a small number compared to the 10,000 in Toronto with these wounds.

John Morgan of Pickering has just finished his 18th treatment. Insulin dependent since last November, he said that a small callus on his foot led to a crack in the skin, and eventually a hole. Two surgeons, he said, had recommended amputation.

"My girlfriend saw an article about the Judy Dan centre in the Toronto Sun, and told me about it. I called the next day, had an assessment and started treatment."

In addition to a 50 per cent improvement in the wound, "I have more feeling in my feet, and I am more mobile. I pick a good movie, and relax."

Patients can either come on their own, or be referred by their physician.

For more information on the centre, which is located at at the Branson Division of North York General Hospital, 555 Finch Ave. W., call 416-223-6600.

Learn not to put it off till tomorrow

In coaching, the word comes up over and over again. We all do it. We put off applying for that job until we lose the magical 20 pounds. Or we don't write the thank-you note right away or make the difficult phone call. We leave memos, speeches, presentations and homework until the last minute, working breathlessly to finish what we should have started earlier. It's that 15-letter word that affects all of us and reminds me of this line: "Procrastination is like a credit card: it's a lot of fun, until you get the bill."

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

It is a constant refrain in coaching, and as Alice P. Cornyn-Selby puts it, "Procrastination is, hands down, our favourite form of self-sabotage."

So how do we become "unstuck" and thus have more happiness, peace and calm in our lives? First of all, recognize that you aren't alone. Often we procrastinate because we are perfectionists who become so stuck on perfecting the details that we delay moving the project along until the last minute. This is a way of not having to face the fear of imperfection.

We also procrastinate because we would rather have fun. But ironically, until we complete the task, we can't fully enjoy ourselves anyway, so we might as well do what we have to do in the first place and get it out of the way.

Another common form of procrastination is seen in the crisis junkie or adrenalin seeker, who only gets motivated at the last moment when the pressure is on. There are also the people who take on too much and never face the most important task they are responsible for because they are juggling so many balls.

In their book Time Efficiency Makeover, Dorothy Breininger and Debby Bitticks state, "Very simply, procrastinating is the deliberate act of excessive postponing. Procrastination is the avoidance of doing a task that needs to be accomplished. And this avoidance can lead to feelings of guilt, inadequacy, depression and self-doubt. Procrastination interferes with professional, academic and personal success."

So how do we control it and really get unstuck from this habit of leaving a task to the last minute?

For one thing, make sure that your desk or work area is neat and organized before you start whatever task you're working on. If necessary, clean the clutter first and you will be able to see clearly what you need to accomplish. Set aside time every day to do your correspondence – thank-you notes, bills, responding to e-mails – and just sit down every day and show up at this appointment you make with yourself. This also applies to homework. If it is done every day at the same time, it becomes a good habit that can replace the postponing habit.

Also, have a great scheduling tool, whether it's manual (the old-fashioned appointment book), or a Blackberry or Palm Pilot, and let it work for you. I also find preparing a "To do" list on a fresh piece of paper every day and putting it in your workspace can be very helpful. This can be typed or handwritten, but it is a great visual aid. Also make visual reminders of the work you want to accomplish.

Remember to acknowledge what you have accomplished and what successes you have created already, instead of dwelling on what is still left to do.

Take small baby steps and break down all of the big items into manageable pieces. It also really helps to put a date beside each goal or project or assignment and stick to it. Try to visualize yourself as a person who doesn't procrastinate. Or think of someone who is very well-organized and imagine stepping into their shoes and visualize what they would do to get the job done.

Finally, take action. Once you start, the momentum really does propel you to finish the task before you know it. And just think of the great feeling you'll have when you've completed what you set out to do!

Arab-Jewish festival films deal with history, co-existence, identity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

This year's edition of the Voices Forward festival, a showcase of Israeli and Palestinian culture at the Royal theatre at 608 College Street, runs from May 31 to June 3 and features 10 films.

A preview:

Bridge over the Wadi, by Barak and Tomer Heymann, is an intriguing examination of the limits of Arab-Jewish co-existence in Israel.

Three years ago, as the second Palestinian uprising raged, a group of progressive Jewish and Arab parents formed a binational and bilingual school in Wadi Ara, a mainly Arab-inhabited area of Israel adjacent to the West Bank. The Bridge over the Wadi school, in the village of Kfar Kara, would have room for 50 Jewish and 50 Arab Grade 3 pupils. They would supposedly learn the virtues of mutual understanding and tolerance. Explaining why she enrolled her child in the school, a young Arab mother says, "I didn't want my daughter to hate Jews, as I did."

In the spirit of this joint venture, the students celebrate Chanukah, visit a mosque, learn the Hebrew and Arabic alphabets, teach each other words, and observe a moment of silence in honour of Holocaust Memorial Day.

Doubts soon emerge.

A Jewish father questions the need for studying the Koran, and in a fearful reference to the Arab students, a Jewish mother says, "We are training children who one day will come to kill us." Meanwhile, two teachers clash over the Palestinian refugee problem and an Arab teacher upsets Jewish parents by claiming that Israel expanded its borders at the expense of Arabs. As the film closes, Jewish and Arab boys engage in a rough verbal exchange, but viewers are told that, in 2005, twice as many students signed up to attend the school.

Is the glass half full or half empty? You be the judge.

We Too Have No Other Land, directed by Jerrold Kessel and Pierre Klochendler, also deals with the vexing question of co-existence. Last year, against all odds, an obscure and poorly funded team from the Israeli Arab village of Sakhnin, coached by a Jew, won Israel's professional soccer championship.

The film leaves two different impressions. The club builds bridges between Jewish and Arab communities and symbolizes the struggle for equal rights in Israel. But when Sakhnin plays Betar Jerusalem, passions flare. Arab fans shout, "Betar, the whore," while Jewish fans liken Arabs to suicide bombers and impugn Mohammed the prophet as gay. Some enlightened fans, however, chant, "Arab and Jew, Jew and Arab."

Like Bridge over the Wadi, We Have No Other Land highlights the fraught relationship between Jews and Arabs in Israel.

Goal Dreams, by Maya Sanbar and Jeffrey Saunders, profiles the Palestinian national soccer team, a symbol of Palestinian identity. "Our role is to provide hope," explains one of the players. "We're a country but not a state," says the team sponsor, a businessman.

A Jewish and an Arab student at the Bridge over the Wadi school

The ragtag squad, coached by a stolid Austrian who can only communicate through an interpreter, is made up of ethnic Palestinians from around the world, including Chile and the United States. As this fly-on-the-wall film unfolds, the players prepare for a 2006 World Cup qualifying game against Uzbekistan in Qatar. Though not particularly talented, they are motivated and spunky.

The team, which trains in the Gaza Strip and Egypt, grapples with a variety of problems. Some of the players can't get through the border crossing. Still others mourn the deaths of friends killed in an Israeli air strike.

The Bride of Galilee turns on the agony of personal loss. Fatma Hawari, a 78-year-old Israeli Arab who is confined to a wheelchair and lives alone with bitter memories, was paralyzed in 1948 when an Israeli war plane struck her home and burned her relatives to a crisp. Looking back, friends recall that she was an exquisitely beautiful woman.

The pilot who bombed her house was Abe Nathan, the famous peace activist. Basel Tanus' touching film is about his attempt to win her forgiveness and her efforts to extract a disability pension from the Israeli government. Having been denied a pension for decades, Fatma needs Nathan's help to secure one. But when she visits him in Tel Aviv, she realizes that she actually may be better off than him.

The State of Israel vs. Tali Fahima concerns the strange case of an Israeli Jewish woman from the development town of Kiryat Gat who befriended Zakaria Zbeidi, a commander of the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade in Jenin, and offered to be his human shield.

As a result of her unusual gesture, Tali Fahima was charged with being an accomplice to terrorism, arrested and demonized as a traitor.

Tal Hakim's coolly balanced, somewhat surrealistic film documents her legal battle and lengthy detention, the impact of her detention on her mother and sister and her odd friendship with one of the most wanted Palestinians in the West Bank. Zbeidi, a rifle slung around his shoulder, is a study in composure as he recounts Israel's attempts on his life and voices his desire for peace.

Bil'in My Love, by Shai Carmeli Pollak, tells the story of the Arab residents of a West Bank village who defy the Israeli government by mounting weekly non-violent demonstrations in support of their cause. The villagers, backed by pro-Palestinian activists from abroad, protest that Israel has no right to expropriate half their land and uproot their olive trees so that the separation barrier can be built and a nearby Jewish settlement can expand its boundaries.

Told from the viewpoint of an Israeli protester who opposes the intrusive route of the security fence, this passionate film focuses on a 50-year-old farmer who is due to lose his land and on the clashes that pit protesters against soldiers.

Short Stories from the Middle East, funded by the World Health Organization, consists of four graphic short movies about the lives of Palestinians and Israeli Arabs.

Jonathan Ben Efrat's The Mall zeroes in on illegal Palestinian workers who dwell in a dark, smelly, mosquito-infested unfinished shopping mall in Israel. Sobhi al-Zodaidi's Missing Gaza revolves around Israel's closure policy and checkpoint system in the West Bank and its effect on Palestinians. Ayelet Bechar's Power is about an Israeli Bedouin Arab who joins the Israeli army so that his unrecognized village, bereft of running water and electricity, will finally receive basic services. Hanna Musleh's Journey with Naba is a profile of a poor Palestinian family dependent on United Nations food rations.

Emile's Girlfriend, the only feature film under review in this roundup, starts promisingly in a hot Tel Aviv flat on a summer day. Yoav, a virile Israeli, answers a knock on his door. Delphine, a non-Jewish visitor from Paris, has arrived. She is Emile's lover, whom Yoav met during a recent trip to France. Yoav accompanies Delphine to a Jewish history museum and to a sunny beach, where they embrace and kiss.

Now based in Israel, Kosoy's vision is to combine Jewish music with a powerful message of faith, hope and inspiration "to arouse the hearts of Jews all over the world." Greatly influenced by folk music, he and his musical partner Yonason Hill have a style that has been compared to Simon and Garfunkel.

Elyon, like Kosoy's previous CDs, Patience With the Ordinary and Return, should be available in Jewish stores locally.

Ballet conductor creates unity of music and movement

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

As music director and principal conductor of the National Ballet of Canada, David Briskin says he must always be attuned to, and respect, the delicate balance between the dancers on stage and the orchestra in the pit.

"I always envision a ballet company as a scale," said Briskin, who has held the baton since September.

"In certain companies, the dance takes precedence and the music is really there to serve the dance and serve the dancers. In other companies… the music is dominant and the dancers dance and the music is there.

"Here, there's a very, very close relationship. They're really on an equal basis, there's a great deal of collaboration here, between the dancers and myself, the ballet masters and myself, to really put the music and movement together… so it creates kind of a unity."

Before joining the National Ballet last fall, Briskin had guest conducted for the company a number of times.

To take the job, he moved to Toronto from New York with his wife, dance manager Julia Blackburn, and their 18-month-old daughter Charlotte. Briskin previously worked for the New York City Ballet and for seven years as conductor with American Ballet Theatre.

Toronto is a welcome change for the family, Briskin said, and the National Ballet of Canada is a good fit. He said he knew from his guest conducting experiences that he would like to spend more time with the company.

"I know the importance of music in this company, I know what its cultural values are. You sense that when you go into a company. Every company has a certain culture, some are healthier than others. This is particularly healthy."

And Briskin has been pleased with his choice so far, both in terms of the ballet season and his new Canadian life.

"It's been everything that I expected," he said. "We were very, very warmly welcomed, not only professionally but socially as well."

Briskin said that within two or three months of moving to Canada, the family received several invitations to seders and Charlotte was invited to a Chanukah party.

He called this a reflection of the high calibre of people involved with the ballet company, from employees to patrons to its board of directors.

The music director had to adjust to two new homes. He came on board with the ballet company as it started its first season in the new Four Seasons Centre for the Performing Arts, where he said that out of 2,071 seats, there isn't a bad one in the house.

"It's one of the best places to see and hear work," he said. "It has an immediacy and an intimacy that few other halls have."

Since the centre was designed for opera, he said, it does present some challenges in reaching a balance between dance and music.

"Because of the immediacy and because of the acoustics of the hall, there's no places to really hide… the very nature of the house is going to raise the level of performance, because it just feels as if everyone is very close to you, and the sound that you get back is very close and very, very honest and clear. There's not a big boomy or whooshy sound and that has some challenges to deal with," he said.

Matjash Mrozewski's Wolf's Court runs June 2 to 9. It's a brand new piece complete with original score by Alexina Louie. Briskin said it is particularly suited to the acoustics of the Four Seasons Centre.

"What I've seen so far looks absolutely magical," he said.

"One of the things Alexina told me is that she was creating the piece specifically with the acoustic of the opera house in mind. It's a very, very richly textured score, but there's a tremendous amount of detail, which in this house we're going to be able to hear."

In terms of Briskin's goals for the company's future, he said he would like give the orchestra a chance to shine on its own, taking them out of the pit and putting them on stage. This will begin with a noontime Thursday concert series in the Four Seasons Centre's Richard Bradshaw Amphitheatre in November.

"That was the other reason that it was quite attractive to come, because Karen talked to me before I came a lot about what her vision for the company was, and I felt that these were values that I could very easily get on board with and help and support," he said.

Briskin's favourite part of the process is working collaboratively with both the musicians and the dancers and choreographer, and then bringing the two together to create a seamless product.

"I love performing, but to me the process is just as interesting as the product," he said.

As a conductor he must never compromise the musical side of performance, he said, but he must also give dancers enough flexibility to make them feel comfortable.

"When something is just right, and the pacing is just right and the tempo is just right, they feel that and their performances are better--and that's what we do."

Multimedia show documents recent South African history

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Warren Wilensky has created a "digital opera" about South Africa's transition from apartheid to freedom.

The Passion of Winnie, which premières June 8 as part of Toronto's Luminato arts festival, views South Africa's history through the eyes of controversial politician Winnie Mandela, the ex-wife of the country's former president, Nelson Mandela.

Wilensky's digital opera is a multimedia production that includes a live orchestra, chorus and soloists, who perform while moving images are run on three screens and five projectors.

The power of this production, says Wilensky, is that it helps hold the viewer's focus. "It brings the audience into the story and keeps them involved.

"At the same time, you've got these images that are portraying emotions as well, to make it more accessible."

The score was written by Bongani Ndodana-Breen, who is also the conductor. Wilensky wrote the lyrics, and the music is a blend of Xhosa rhythms, Township jive, Cape Town jazz and anti-apartheid street chants.

Wilensky, a filmmaker, moved to Canada from South Africa 10 years ago. He shot the images on his visits back to the small rural village of Mbeulene, where his nanny retired.

Wilensky says the idea for the opera came about while he and Ndodana-Breen partook in "a drunken evening on Thanksgiving dinner in 2003."

"We kind of sat with it. Both of us were too scared to approach the subject matter. Winnie is a very controversial figure.

"Even today when you mention the subject, many South Africans look at you weirdly," he says.

But after doing some research, a "rounded story" came together, he says.

"A story of a hero and a fallen hero, which made the most sense for the medium of opera."

Wilensky is happy to have the chance to share this story. "Having the opportunity to tell a story of the birth of our country, that's just an honour," he says.

"To be involved in such a thing, we are helping to define our culture, especially this portion, which has been kind of left out."

Warren Wilensky

Wilensky says most people do not know much about Winnie Mandela, and when they do have some background, it is "stuck on pause in the 1980s and '90s, when things weren't going so well." Mandela is popular among her supporters, who refer to her as the "Mother of the Nation," yet reviled by others.

Wilensky hopes that people come away from the digital opera without judging Mandela, because he says no one can do that without living in her shoes first and experiencing some of her trials, such as the 200 days she spent in solitary confinement.

He adds that he is grateful for the opportunity to bring The Passion of Winnie to Luminato.

"It's very unlikely that we would have had the perspective or distance to do this in South Africa," he says.

The Passion of Winnie premières at the Isabel Bader Theatre, 93 Charles St.W., at 8 p.m. on June 8 and 9. Tickets are $30 and $40 and are available online at www.luminato.com or by calling Ticketmaster at 416-872-1111.

Luminato, a multi-disciplinary arts festival that features more than 100 events, takes place across the city from June 1 to 10.

SEE CHINA THROUGH JEWISH EYES

Toronto travel professional Harriet Morton is offering an 18-day tour called "China… A Journey Through Jewish Eyes," this fall. As on her previous Chinese-Jewish journeys, the itinerary includes various sites in and around Beijing, Harbin, Zhengzhou-Kaifeng, Xian, Shibaozhai, the Three Gorges and Shanghai, including much about China's rich but little-known Jewish history.

Included for the first time is a visit to the recently opened Jewish History of Harbin Museum, which Morton calls "the most dramatic and elaborate presentation centre that I have ever visited worldwide." Among the many Jews who came to Harbin in the early 1900s was Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's grandfather, who was buried there.

The tour departs Oct. 17 and returns Nov. 3, with optional extensions into Guilin and Hong Kong thru Nov. 7. For information and registration, please call Harriet Morton or Belle Araneta of New Wave Travel, 416-928-3113, ext. 273 or 245; call 1-800-463-1512, or e-mail harriet@newwavetravel.net

The book describes 351 Jewish sites, including museums and historic buildings such as Golda Meir's house in Denver, the Cuban Hebrew Synagogue in Miami Beach and the only synagogue in San Francisco to survive the 1906 earthquake.

Also listed are nearly 200 JCCs, 335 mikvahs, 489 Chabad houses, 4,309 synagogues and nearly 1,500 kosher restaurants and eating establishments, with particulars about rabbinical supervision.

"The book is a must for the Jewish traveller in the United States and Canada," according to its compiler Oscar Israelowitz, from whom it may be purchased for $19.95 (US) plus shipping. It's also available in many bookstores and through Amazon.com www.israelowitzpublishing.com

A poet down by the river

Black River* by Kenneth Sherman, Porcupine's Quill.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

The next time you hear it said that Canadians lack a sense of history and identity, an effective response would be to offer a copy of Kenneth Sherman's powerful new poetry collection, Black River. In it, in ways both lyrical and ironic, Sherman addresses the Ontario landscape's colonial and aboriginal history. At the same time, he manages to interweave this public history with private memories of youth and family life spent along the Black River in south central Ontario.

Norman Ravvin

The outcome is a quiet tour de force – a short book built on the kind of introspection and stylistic alertness that readers once expected from such American poets as Charles Olson, and can still find in the work of Philip Levine. Black River calls to mind Levine's finely wrought poems of youth and hard work, in part because both poets have a satisfyingly subtle way of including Jewish themes in the broader context of their narrative and poetic concerns. Both have committed themselves to portraying, in detail and with pathos, a specific time and place.

In Levine's case, it is Detroit in its heyday as a manufacturing mecca, a place of hard work and difficult lives. In Black River, Sherman recalls for us a youth spent along the banks of the Black River, which flows through the Ontario town of Sutton on its way into Lake Simcoe.

Among Black River's strengths is its retrospective point of view – the poet's recollection in maturity of the kind of river life he experienced as a boy. In one of the book's loveliest stanzas, he recalls how he once drifted,

watching a girl chew on a stalk of grass.

Behind her, a tire swing,

a sagging shack, her father's rusted

Mercury on concrete blocks.

Her perfect pale legs.

One does not have to be a connoisseur of rusted wrecks (as I am) to recognize in this a fine juxtaposition of memory, of the discoveries of youth alongside the assuredness of decline.

Sherman presents the once lovely landscape around Black River as one in steep decline. He writes darkly of the "forests at Simcoe/ cleared for development. Prosperity/ and the end of identity." The history of the river – its ability to support life and memory – has been destroyed by "ammonia, phosphates, PCBs… Our luminous cocktail." It is through this theme that the collection includes a portrait of contemporary Canada, about which Sherman has a few caustic things to say.

The landscape's history, Black River reminds us, is not without its dark chapters. The poems invoke the arrival of Samuel de Champlain and the early Huron fear "that the great harvest/ might end" with the arrival of Europeans. What in fact followed was a great reduction.

Thirty thousand of the indigenous

KENNETH SHERMAN
BLACK RIVER

near Simcoe's green shores, powerless against the virus

dispensed by servants of Jesus.

Sherman complicates this colonial history by working his own Jewishness into his poetic tableau. A visit to the local church conjures a memory of "our small synagogue in unassuming brick/ protected by maples." And in strangely powerful stanzas he links the area's suppressed aboriginal character with Jewishness: "1956. Our town's cigar-store wooden Indian,/ his profile cracked, Semitic." In the same way he recalls his "grandfather's nose and bronzed skin/ akin to the Indian's: the Sioux-Jew,/ the Huron-Hebrew." And there is the cryptic presence in the river's summertime past of a remnant of wartime Europe:

the park by the public pier, immigrants with their coolers and caps–

a glimpse of their pale forearms,

the shock of their blue

It is this idiosyncratic presentation of local history and identity that places Black River far above stereotypical musings about what it means to be Canadian. Sherman's poetry achieves a fine balance between the public and the personal, the poetic and the political, merging philosophical musings with childhood romance. If you have, by chance, forgotten the pleasures of poetry, Kenneth Sherman's Black River will reawaken them for you.

Norman Ravvin's books include the novel Lola by Night and the story collection Sex, Skyscrapers and Standard Yiddish. His essays on Canadian landscape and history are collected in Hidden Canada: An Intimate Travelogue. He is chair of Concordia's Institute for Canadian Jewish Studies.

Toronto FC defender loves playing at the highest level

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In most sports, very little is expected of expansion teams beyond providing good entertainment.

In its first three games in its Major League Soccer (MLS) debut season, Toronto FC lived up to those low expectations. It dropped all three contests and was held scoreless before heading back to BMO Field at Exhibition Place for its home opener.

Although the results on home field were no better – they were shut out in that game too – they did manage to crank up the entertainment value and excite a very enthusiastic crowd.

Following that game, defender Adam Braz could see the tide turning. The team's "fantastic" effort in that game four home opener, if duplicated, would soon pay off, he predicted.

"We're not a team that likes to just sit back, soak up pressure and counterattack. We like to move the ball quickly and create a more attacking game," he said.

By game five, it turned out he was right. Toronto FC scored its first goals of the season and cruised to a 3-1 victory over the Chicago Fire.

"We struggled to start the year, especially the first three games where we didn't put in good performances," Braz said. Returning home, the club was inspired by the tremendous reception from its fans, and he predicted even before the inaugural victory "the ball will go in."

"At the end of the day, we have to perform, especially for the fans, who are great," he added.

An outside defender, whose job description is partly to make forward runs and take part in the attack, Braz was signed as a free agent to a four-year contract. He joined Toronto FC because "I want to play at the highest possible level. To do so in Toronto is great."

Now 25, Braz has been a fan of Major League Soccer since he was 12 years old. Like a typical kid growing up in Montreal, his first team sport was hockey, but by age seven he realized he didn't like it all that much. Soccer, on the other hand, was the perfect fit. Perhaps the fact his dad, an Israeli, was a huge soccer fan also played a part in switching sports.

Though he started as a recreational player, Braz quickly moved up to AA and then AAA levels.

A student at Herzliah High School, he made the provincial soccer team and the youth national under-17 teams. Later he played on the Canadian under-20 squad and Canada's Olympic team, which, unfortunately, did not qualify for the Athens games.

For four of the last five professional seasons, Braz suited up for the Montreal Impact of the United Soccer Leagues (USL), one level below MLS. He helped the Impact win three consecutive USL First Division titles and bolstered an Impact backline that held opponents to 15 goals in 28 games. He played the 2003 season in Sweden before returning to his home team.

Braz remains part of a pool of 20 to 30 players who are called on to comprise Canada's national team. The coach selects 18 players for any one game or tournament and Braz considers it "a privilege to be able to represent the country."

Last March he was on the national team that played Bermuda in a friendly, and two years ago he played all three games in the Gold Cup, a regional tournament involving CONCACAF (North American, Central American, and Caribbean) countries.

Adam Braz

Canada has been a weak sister in these regional and international events for years, but Braz believes that "Canadian soccer is changing. Over the past few years, we've developed into a much better side and we're starting to play better soccer.

"We're trying to get positive results and a winning mentality."

Braz has already attained two of his sports-related goals: the chance to represent his country and "to be able to do this as my profession. It's the one thing I wanted to do. It's my passion and I love it."

Adulthood arrives in a moment

Sandie
Benitah
20Something

His name is John Hanan, and he's the man I thought I'd be introducing to you as my fiancé.

I was already thinking about how I would do that, since he's not Jewish. I thought about the angry letters that I would get, and that this paper would probably get for presenting me as a so-called example of a good 20something Jewish girl.

I didn't care though, because I knew our relationship was well worth the criticism and skepticism.

But all that is irrelevant now, because on April 19, John passed away.

Instead of the column I was planning to write, arguing that I, and eventually our children, could and would continue to be Jewish in every way, despite my partner's religion, I now feel that I only need to explain who John was to justify why I fell so uncontrollably in love with him.

I first noticed him seven years ago in a journalism school radio class. After flashing me a mischievously charming smile, he told our instructor that I wasn't pulling my weight on an assignment. I knew then that this would be the one guy who wouldn't let me get away with anything.

A year later, after more flirtatious testing of my spirit, we started dating. Though there were some definite bumps in the road, we remained inseparable, not only as each other's loves, but as best buds. When we moved in together, I knew that I had never been happier in my life. He was my Number 1 supporter and I am still his Number 1 admirer.

John was sweet and sensitive. He kept me on my toes, both intellectually and as a human being. He was passionate about the environment, had a deep understanding of world issues and loved people who were genuine. I knew he was a keeper when my nieces reassured me he was 99.999 per cent cuter than Justin Timberlake.

The truth is, he was 100 per cent a decent person, and one billion per cent worthy of my and my family's respect.

He taught me to be honest and to speak from the heart, but now that my heart is broken, it's difficult to speak words that make any sense about what it feels like to lose a best friend.

A couple of months ago, I wrote about a special woman who was battling cancer with grace and compassion. Ironically, I wondered about how difficult it must be to lose someone you love and I vowed to appreciate and make the most out of every moment. Although I really did do that, I now know there are never enough kind words or good moments to ease the devastation of death.

It has been almost three years since I started writing this column, and most of the time, I've wondered about when I was going to feel like an adult, rather than like a child pretending to be a grown-up.

But adulthood came in a mere moment with this loss of innocence.

In the past month since John passed away, my wonderful friends and family have made me laugh, but my smile will never again be as bright. Yes, life goes on, but it will never be as rosy. And sure, love will come knocking again, but it won't ever be as pure as what I had with John.

I guess adulthood is about survival, and if my love has taught me anything, it's that I can't get away with anything without doing my best.

About Life

Dear Ella,

My house sometimes feels like a real war zone. We have four kids ranging in age from 10 to 17. The problem lies with the middle two. Karen is 12 and Jeff is15. I really think these two kids hate each other. It causes such horrible feelings in our family. They can't even be in the same room together, which makes family outings a thing of the past.

Karen has a very strong personality and is aggressive and outgoing, whereas her brother Jeff is more of a thinker. He keeps to himself and doesn't need a lot of glory or recognition. These two have always been confrontational, but it's been manageable. This is no longer the case. They're out of control, and my husband and I are constantly jumping in and yelling. Sometimes, when I take a step back, it seems like we are living in a mad house. Any suggestions?

Sibling Rivalry

Dear Sibling Rivalry

Sounds like you have your hands full. Sibling rivalry is not new, nor is it unique to certain kinds of families. However, it is very disruptive to the family unit, as you well know.

My guess is that this didn't just start overnight. There was probably some underlying rivalry between these two for a long time. There are many factors that come into play: the kids' individual personalities, their place in the family unit, their ages, their genders, jealousy, how you treat them, how their other siblings interact with them. All of this plays a role in their clashing.

You can start by setting house rules. If you have set up rules such as no swearing, hitting or door slamming, you must enforce them. Once you know they're not in danger, let them work it out. Don't mix in, and don't take sides – all that will do is fuel the fire. Make sure they are safe and let them get through it without your intervention. They will eventually work it out, or they'll separate and move on. By allowing them to resolve their own battles, you're letting them develop resources that will serve them well later in life.

Speak to your family doctor. If you feel all this is more than you can bare, try family counselling. Perhaps a professional can give you the tools you need to get through this stage in their lives. Often kids who fight through their childhood end up very close as adults.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

It's great to hang out together

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

On a recent Shabbat, I took my son to Clanton Park. Noah River is a year old now, and it is an absolute delight to hang out with him there, or for that matter, most any place.

We approached the park from Palm Drive, just west of Bathurst Street north of Wilson Avenue, where you'll find a jungle gym, swings, slides and a teeter-totter. My little man was excited when we arrived and began making motorboat sounds with his tongue (he extends his tongue, presses it against his bottom lip and blows).

I parked his stroller and unclipped the straps that secure him. He flailed his arms and feet like a penguin and made a loud shrieking noise of joy. I laughed so hard.

The park began to fill up with people just as we arrived. A couple with a baby perhaps five months old entered the park. Noah and I are pretty friendly, and therefore bid the young family a good morning (they didn't look Jewish so we didn't say, "Good Shabbes").

The response? Nothing. Not a "hello," "how are you," or most importantly, "so what's your son's name?" This struck me as somewhat odd, but then I remembered. This is life. There are those people who will embrace a shared experience (like hanging out in the same park together), and others who are shy or disinterested. This couple was just not into us. That's okay, though. We were fine and moved on.

I put Noah into the baby swing and he burst out into a giggle, as it swung back and forth – of course not too high. His mother would be upset. We then sat on the adult swing, he in my lap, and carefully, well a bit higher than Miriam might like, swung and swung and swung. As we did this, a father and son entered the park.

The little fellow, perhaps three years old, was very effusive. Yes he is like that child you are thinking about who is obsessively curious and completely into the moment. My son's green and yellow rake and shovel elicited a 10-minute speech from the chatty lad.

Well, this father and son were pleasant and gregarious. The father took great pride in his son's loquacious nature. He pointed out to Noah and me how his boy would continue to challenge us with queries about everything from the colour of our baby bag to the two front teeth easing their way through Noah's gums.

The park was our world for a short while, and so far, I had met Mr. and Mrs. Keep-to-ourselves and father and son ultra-friendly.

Shul-goers began to return home. Some of them wished me a good Shabbes, others said hello, and still others said nothing. A man with a hunting dog came to greet us, but the dog showed little interest in Noah and me, and continued on with his nose to the ground looking for the fox or squirrel he was bred to find.

Soon enough, I met a lovely Ukrainian woman with a 13-month-old son. She was new to the area and happy to meet someone who would interact with her. She was charming, and told Noah and me about the hardships she has gone through, including being separated from two of her children who still reside in Kiev.

After a couple of hours, we packed up our toy bag, folded our blanket, and I loaded Noah into the stroller and we walked home.

Clanton Park was the 'hood I grew up in, and it is nice to be back there with my boy. Hanging with Noah is the most enjoyable thing in the world.

Six days of war, 40 years ago

Sderot residents cope with attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Atara Orenbuch's children think themselves lucky when the daily toll of incoming Qassam rockets drops to only three.

When only three missiles land to randomly cause damage and death in the development town of Sderot, the time between attacks gives them the sense that it's almost safe to go outside and play.

Going outdoors, of course, doesn't mean a family jaunt to the park or a shopping mall, but merely to a courtyard area in their apartment complex. They have to be nearby so that when warning sirens sound, protective shelters are only moments away. Thousands of homemade Qassam rockets have been fired into Israel over the past few years; 220 in the last half of May alone.

Orenbuch has six children, and for much of the past few weeks, they have been cooped up in the family's apartment. At night, all six, along with her and her husband, Amit, sleep together in one room that has been constructed with thicker, protective concrete walls. It's the family's personalized shelter that protects them from the Qassams that regularly fly in from nearby Gaza.

Life in Sderot has gone beyond normal in the past few years, Orenbuch said last week in a telephone interview from Israel. When she and her husband moved to the southern development town eight years ago as

First Negev Dinner

BARRIE, Ont. — The Jewish National Fund and Am Shalom Congregation, Barrie, Ont.'s only synagogue, recently hosted the city's first-ever Negev Dinner. Businessman Stephen Sperling, president and CEO of the Aerarium Group, Barrie's largest developer of commercial and industrial property, was honoured at the April 29 event, which raised funds for youth programs in Barrie and Israel. Sperling is a founder and past president of Am Shalom and a longtime JNF supporter.

WORLD

Killer Pleads Insanity

SEATTLE — The man accused of shooting up the Seattle Jewish federation office has changed his plea to innocent by reason of insanity. Lawyers for Naeeid Haq, the Pakistani American accused in the attack that killed one and injured five others last July, said May 30 their client has a long history of mental illness, Associated Press reported. The lawyers said Haq has made several suicide attempts over the years and been diagnosed with bipolar disorder with psychotic features. Haq is charged with murder in the death of Pamela Waechter, 58, director of the Jewish Federation of Greater Seattle's annual fundraising drive, and five counts of attempted murder in the July 28 attack. His trial is set for January. He's being held in jail without bail.

Extradition Likely

BUDAPEST — An Australian man accused of killing a Jew in Hungary in World War II will likely be extradited to Hungary. Hungary's Foreign Ministry suspects that Charles Zentai, 84, killed Peter Balazs in Budapest for failing to wear a yellow star identifying him as a Jew. The killing allegedly occurred in 1944 when Zentai tortured and fatally beat Balazs, 18, in an army barrack. Zentai, who immigrated to Australia in 1950, denies the allegations. An Australian court refused to block his extradition last week, rejecting his lawyer's request that it be delayed until Australia's high court hears his appeal. Zentai was ordered to reappear in August.

Israeli Activist Runs for WJC President

TEL AVIV — Israeli writer and activist Einat Wilf has announced a long-shot candidacy for president of the World Jewish Congress.

The former foreign policy adviser to Israeli Deputy Prime Minister Shimon Peres is being backed by KolDor, an international group of next-generation leaders. Wilf, 36, is working on a Cambridge University PhD in political science. Her focus is the WJC in the 1990s, when the group was at the centre of the battle for Shoah restitution money. She has written two books on Israeli public policy.

Einat Wilf

Edgar Bronfman, who has been WJC president since 1979, will step down June 10. The same day in New York, WJC's governing board will elect an interim president to serve until the organization's next plenary meeting in 2009.

Ronald Lauder, the cosmetics mogul and Jewish National Fund president, Mendel Kaplan, chair of the WJC executive committee and a South African steel manufacturer, and Israeli academic Vladimir Herzberg are also in the race.

"My candidacy is motivated by a deep concern for the future of the World Jewish Congress and the widening gap between what it has been, what it could be and its present state," Wilf wrote in her nomination letter, adding that " a new and committed generation of Jewish activists [must] articulate a vision for the WJC and commit to realizing it."

Blog Fights Boycott

LONDON — A prominent British TV journalist has started a blog to help fight the National Union of Journalists' vote to boycott Israeli goods. Launched last month by technology and business correspondent Rory Cellan-Jones, the blog Stop the NUJ Boycott will chronicle attempts to overturn the motion. Stopnujboycott.blogspot.com is only open to NUJ members' comments. On the site, Cellan-Jones said he's "just one of a number of BBC journalists concerned at the damage to our reputation for impartiality that results from the NUJ boycott policy." He said some 300 journalists have agreed to sign a petition.

Police Detain Teens

MOSCOW — Police have detained seven teens in the central Russian town of Klintsy in connection with last month's desecration of a Jewish cemetery. The teens attend the same middle school and face up to three years in jail if convicted of taking part in the attack, which toppled 43 gravestones. Due to their ages, they would serve little time if convicted.

Palestinian activists to boycott Chapters/Indigo

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

A Toronto-based pro-Palestinian activist group is urging its supporters to picket in front of Chapters and Indigo bookstores nationwide on June 9 for a "Chapters/Indigo Day of Action."

Heather Reisman

The Coalition Against Israeli Apartheid's (CAIA) website also calls for a boycott of the Canadian bookstore chain "to mark 40 years of apartheid… to send a clear message to majority shareholders Heather Reisman and Gerry Schwartz that their links to the Heseg Foundation… are unexceptable [sic]."

The Heseg (achievement) Foundation provides financial help to youth who've moved to Israel, without their families or a support network, to volunteer in the Israel Defence Forces. It gives scholarships to support these "lone soldiers" in their scholastic pursuits and daily living expenses following completion of military service.

Heseg was founded in 2005 by husband-and-wife power duo Schwartz and Reisman, respectively CEO of Onex Corporation and CEO of Indigo Books and Music Inc. Heseg's website says its purpose is to "support and encourage exceptional young people to realize their full academic potential and join the ranks of those who will lead the world of tomorrow."

The CAIA claims the foundation supports "soldiers from outside of Israel that want to serve in its racist military" and want Reisman and Schwartz to cut financial ties to the foundation.

The group has also held "picket information sessions" Fridays at 5 p.m. in front of the Indigo store at Bay and Bloor streets for the last few months and plans to organize pickets in front of at least six of the company's prominent Toronto storefronts for their "day of action."

A protest leaflet, available for download on CAIA's website, shows a caricature of a faceless Indigo businesswoman casually dropping a bag of money into a hungry Israel Defence Forces soldier's mouth as the soldier savagely throttles a woman on the ground. A subheading on the leaflet reads, "Israeli Apartheid: Made in Canada".

Indigo Books and Music Inc. declined to comment on the situation.

But national Jewish community organizations responded quickly to the CAIA's stated plans.

"No fair-minded observer could even remotely suggest that Israel – the sole pluralistic democracy in the Middle East – is in any way characterized by apartheid policies," wrote Manuel Prutschi, national executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, in an e-mail to The CJN last week. "What we have here… is nothing but a reprehensible and unjust harassment of Chapters/Indigo by a group to focus attention on their pathetic, ongoing anti-Israel efforts."

In a May 17 press release, B'nai Brith Canada accused the CAIA of promoting a "misguided attempt to delegitimize… Israel and its supporters."

Frank Dimant, vice-president of B'nai Brith Canada, defended Schwartz and Reisman in the release, calling the couple "pillars of strength in Canada's Jewish community... philanthropists whose advocacy of worthy causes has benefited Canadians of all backgrounds and walks of life" and equated any boycott action as nothing more than an attempt at "character assassination."

In a July 7, 2005, report on the then newly founded charity, Schwartz told The CJN that Heseg was "the one [project] that has my heart."

A followup CJN report on Dec. 15, 2005, had quotes from both Reisman and Schwartz as they addressed recipients at the first annual Heseg Foundation Grants Awards Ceremony at Ganai Et-Arucha in Tel Aviv.

"This project is a real passion for us because it's an opportunity for us to invest in future leaders of Israel," Reisman said.

"We are a family. As Jews who live outside of Israel, I can tell you… that every one of us in all of those faraway lands know that you're here – and you're here not just for yourself, or just for the State of Israel, you are here protecting the freedom of Jews around the world."

Proud of our own narrative

From the editor's desk

This week we recall and commemorate the 40th anniversary of the Six Day War. It was a turning point in modern Jewish and world history.

Israel's remarkable victory on the field ultimately led to peace treaties with Egypt and with Jordan, albeit after a round of much bloodier fighting with the Egyptians merely six years later. To be sure, both peace treaties have weak pulses. They are felt more on the surface of relations between the countries than in the deep commercial, trading, touring or any other bilateral structure of relations. But the treaties are alive and have held since their respective signings, despite the weakly beating pulses.

But there is no semblance of peace, with weakly beating pulse or otherwise, with the Palestinians.

Worse.

The new Palestinian leadership is resolutely trying to define the conflict along religious rather than territorial parameters. "Land-for-peace" is not a formula that works for Hamas or any of the other extremist Islamic groups that hold sway in Palestinian society.

The old Palestinian leadership, on the other hand, was interested only in acquiring the "land," but not in making the compromises necessary for "peace."

Today, four decades after the war, historians, pundits, analysts and filmmakers of every stripe and political inclination are "assessing" its impact.

Typical of the assessments is the conclusion by Leslie Susser in a commentary for JTA: "The occupation was the most bitter legacy of Israel's 1967 victory on the battlefield."

In hindsight, this may be true. But there is more to the story. And we are entitled to ask how it is that the world little remembers the circumstances that led to the war or the circumstances that unfolded in its aftermath.

There are some essential points worth remembering concerning the occupation of the West Bank:

- Israel pleaded with Jordan NOT to enter the war. (See the Perspectives essay by Jack Chivo in today's issue.)
- Having acquired the West Bank by aggression in 1948, Jordan had no higher legal right to the West Bank than Israel did 19 years later.
- Israel was rebuffed by the Arab world in its efforts to negotiate peace shortly after the war. The Arab League flatly rejected Israel's call for peace with its three famous nos of Khartoum: no negotiation, no recognition, no peace with Israel.
- The three nos of Khartoum were merely the latest "nos" expectorated at Israel. Every prime minister of Israel before and after Khartoum has offered the Palestinians the possibility (and hope) of peace. But the Palestinians have always rejected that possibility.

The world, however, seems not to have noticed. In the intervening 40 years, history has been rewritten and the narrative told and retold only in the capital letters of Palestinian victimology.

Last Rosh Hashanah, The CJN dedicated the holiday supplement entirely to the events of the Six Day War. "An entire generation of Jews," we wrote then, "has been born that has no first-hand, direct knowledge of the events and the feelings that kept us, the older generation, holding our breath, fearful that a new horrific, black night was descending upon Israel and Jews worldwide.

"An entire generation of Jews has grown to adulthood with a sense of Israel and recent Jewish history distorted by the unceasing hostility of Israel's hate-obsessed enemies, and by the unwitting participation of often well-meaning but ignorant confederates.

"An entire generation of Jews has grown to adulthood with the predominant image of Israel as 'colonial occupier,' an image carefully crafted by the unremitting barrage on television and in newspapers of scenes of stone-throwing Palestinian children squaring off against well-armed, flak-jacketed Israeli soldiers or of wailing Palestinian women confronting IDF tanks and heavy equipment.

"The reliability of these heart-rending visual scenes has been reinforced by the imprimatur of the mountain-high record of debates, minutes and resolutions from the United Nations, thus driving home the 'truth' of the images in the hearts and minds of the unknowing. There is no Israel other than this Israel for so many of our youth."

This distortion of the truth, this misperception of Israel is a profound tragedy for the Jewish people and for the world. We see its bitter consequences manifested every day on every continent. Campaigns of boycott and divestment from Israeli businesses are only some of its poisoned fruit.

We must never acquiesce to this distortion. Despite Israel's missteps and the problems and burdens arising from the "occupation," the Six Day War was a profoundly important turning of history's wheel. We must never negate the courage and heroism of the soldiers who fought and of those who fell in that war. And we will never regret that Jews want to live too, that Jews are as entitled as any other people on earth to live in their own country.

Ross' neighbour convicted of second-degree murder

A Newmarket jury deliberated less than four hours before finding Daniel Sylvester guilty of second-degree murder in the death of 25-year-old Alicia Ross.

Last week's verdict carries an automatic life sentence and Sylvester, Ross' neighbour, will face a minimum of 10 years in jail before he is eligible for parole. Judge Edwin Minden will announce the eligibility period for parole at a hearing on July 4.

Outside court, Ross' mother, Sharon Fortis, thanked jurors for not believing Sylvester's story – that he was provoked into attacking her daughter.

Alicia Ross

"The trial centred around a composed story craftily rehearsed and put forward so co-operatively on video as to mask itself as a remorseful confession," Fortis said.

Her daughter was not alive to contradict Sylvester's "lies" because she was "conveniently dead," she told reporters.

"The pain of our loss will never go away," she said in a statement addressed to the jury. "It is with us every day. But you believed in the truth and delivered a verdict that now helps all of us to move forward."

Sylvester showed no emotion when the verdict was announced.

Evidence presented at trial indicated that on the night of Ross' death on Aug. 17, 2005, her boyfriend Sean Hine left her Markham home late and tried calling her at 12:30 a.m. Hine testified he was worried when she did not answer and the next morning she was not home when he dropped by to see her.

He called police at that time.

Sylvester testified he had a chance encounter with Ross in the path between their two homes that night and that he beat her after she called him "a f…ing loser." Forensic evidence showed she had at least 33 fractures and broken bones, including her nasal and cheekbones, and resembled someone killed in a violent car crash.

Sylvester testified he put Ross' lifeless body in his car and drove her to a remote area north of Markham where he deposited it.

About a month later he confessed to police and took them to two locations where parts of the body were located.

Prior to trial, Sylvester, 33, had offered to plead guilty to a manslaughter charge, which would have implied Ross' death was accidental and resulted in a lesser sentence. Crown attorney Kelly Wright declined to accept the plea bargain and the trial went ahead on second-degree murder charge.

The Crown's theory was that Sylvester sexually assaulted Ross before killing her, but the body was too badly decomposed for them to prove how she died. Sylvester admitted masturbating after killing Ross as he drove to a place to hide her body.

Sylvester also testified he lived alone with his mother in the basement of the house next to the Fortis' and that he had no friends or a job. His defence lawyer argued Sylvester was "very dysfunctional," and he snapped when Ross called him a "f…ing loser" because of years of frustration and pent-up anger.

But Wright suggested Sylvester was "intelligent and articulate" and decided to kill Ross after she caught him spying on her and Hine that night.

Zareinu works toward erecting own building

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The first clue that Zareinu Educational Centre is not a run-of-the-mill school can be found along the wall of its main hallway. Oversized strollers, wheelchairs, child-sized walkers, including an innovative and costly hands-free model, and bicycles modified to accommodate children who have mobility issues line the hall.

The 18-year-old school, housed in rented premises in the basement of the Sephardic Kehila Centre in Thornhill, serves children with special needs, including those with cerebral palsy, Down syndrome and autism spectrum disorder.

This Sunday, Zareinu will hold its 10th annual "moveathon," the school's largest fundraiser. The event will feature a festival at Downsview Park with food, rides and entertainment, and a choice of routes – a two-kilometre walk, a 10-kilometre run and a 20-kilometre bike ride. As well, on June 24, there will be a "pro tour" bike ride of 50 or 100 kilometres along the Niagara Escarpment.

Annual per capita costs for each Zareinu student run about $40,000 a year, approximately double the annual tuition, which is just under $20,000. However, the school has never turned away a family for lack of money, Spiegel said.

A golf tournament May 29 raised more than $350,000, he added.

Showing a reporter the school, he paused to point out a young student walking hand in hand with a program assistant. "This is great," said Spiegel enthusiastically. "This kid is walking, and she's walking really well. This is a child who has been in a [wheel]chair for a long, long time."

The school accepts babies as young as six weeks into its infant intervention program and offers services through high school for students up to age 21. The high school program, now in its third year, was started to meet the needs of families who could not find an appropriate program for their older children.

Zareinu serves 73 children at the school and provides services to 30 students elsewhere. It has two satellite high school classes, one at Adath Israel Congregation and one at Beth Jacob High School for Girls. There is generally a maximum of eight children per class.

Although the school is affiliated with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and provides Jewish studies, it serves a small number of non-Jewish children as well. They are accepted if they need what the school has to offer, and if there's a spot open, Spiegel explained, adding that there is a waiting list for most classes.

Some students leave Zareinu to attend mainstream schools. One boy, who has a shadow working with him at his new school, moved on after learning to overcome communication issues and the associated frustration when people didn't understand him.

"Every child has to have a [therapeutic and educational] program specifically for them," Spiegel said. A team of special education teachers for both Judaic and general studies as well as speech, music, occupational and physical therapists work together to help students reach their potential.

In a preschool classroom last week, children learned about tzedakah and mitzvot through interactive play, putting coins in a coin-eating toy and placing cards inside a toy mailbox as they pretended to send get-well cards.

Zareinu offers a unique program, said preschool co-ordinator Pat Resnick, who also teaches Early Childhood Education at Seneca College. "The therapists actually train the teachers and their educational assistants to do some of the therapies with the children, so they're not just getting therapy once or twice a week with the therapists… Everything is inter-related."

Staff need a "very positive outlook," said Resnick. "Our children learn differently, but they all learn… It's a pleasure and a privilege to work here."

Wanda Gascho-White, head of music therapy, uses musical instruments to coax students into interacting with her. A student who doesn't make eye contact, for example, may be fascinated by her guitar. As she very gradually brings the instrument closer to her face, "bit by bit, I'm encouraging them to come more and more into my world." Nascent eye contact and interaction with her become transferable skills that "expand in many ways," she said.

For the past five years, Zareinu has received about $500,000 per year from Ontario's Community Care Access Centres to cover therapy costs, said Spiegel.

Spiegel said Zareinu board members have been working toward a building the school can call its own. An artist's rendering of one plan sits on his desk. The current premises of less than 10,000 square feet is about a quarter the size that is needed, he said.

He credits the school's board for being "incredibly fiscally responsible," and said there will not be a new building until it is certain that affiliated operating costs can be met.

"I'm hoping it's going to be soon."

More boycott, more hypocrisy

The United Kingdom's largest academic union – representing some 120,000 workers in higher education – last week voted 158 to 99 to urge its constituent branches to consider a boycott of Israeli academics. The University and College Union did not call for an all-out boycott of the Jewish state, but their meaning was clear.

The drafters of the motion left no doubt about their feelings regarding the Jewish state. "Israel's 40-year occupation has seriously damaged the fabric of Palestinian society through annexation, illegal settlement, collective punishment and restriction of movement."

As JTA reported, the vote was the latest of several British efforts to boycott Israel. Last month the National Union of Journalists passed a motion to boycott Israeli goods. More recently, a group of British doctors, journalists and architects also called for a boycott within their respective professions.

This latest decision by the academic union is an affront to decency. It is evidence of obsession. It is evidence of singular and single-minded animosity towards the Jewish state.

Were there even the slightest feint towards fairness in the motion, its proponents could possibly argue they were motivated by concerns of justice and compassion. But lacking fairness, justice as a motive is belied. And lacking the motivation of justice, malice is all it has left.

Writing in Ma'ariv last week, Israeli journalist Ben-Dror Yemini pointed out the obvious: "Boycotting Israel and not Syria or Russia, leads the British hypocrisy, and not the British morality, to new records. Because if human rights and human lives were what interested the British, they would devote much greater energy to what is happening in Darfur [to cite an obvious example] than to what is happening in the West Bank."

Israeli cabinet minister Isaac Herzog, whose portfolio includes monitoring anti-Semitism abroad, called the union's decision "troubling."

The Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations referred to the resolutions passed by the British union, not all of which are specifically boycott measures, as "obscene."

And they are.

Closer to home, the Canada-Israel Committee issued a call to action to all fair-minded individuals who are offended if not also worried by the union's brazen attack against Israel.

Outrage, anger and disgust at the union's behaviour are warranted emotional responses. But they are not sufficient. We must do all that we can to counter this latest British call to boycott Israel.

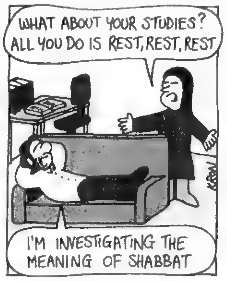
Doctors' group responds to Steinberg

Médecins Sans Frontières (MSF)/Doctors Without Borders protests in the strongest terms Gerald Steinberg's column "When aid is exploited for terror" (CJN, May 31). The charges that have been laid in Israel against former MSF social worker Mossaab Bashir are of grave concern to us as well. We are closely monitoring the situation. Meanwhile, keep in mind that the allegations have not been proven in court.

According to international judicial principles, he is still presumed innocent until a court of law declares otherwise. Bashir's alleged activities in no way implicate MSF.

MSF strives to observe neutrality and independence in many radicalized and violent regions of the world. MSF seeks to provide impartial medical care for those most in need in more than 70 countries. We reject Steinberg's insinuations that MSF is somehow connected to activities that go against our humanitarian mandate. It is a slight against all those we strive to assist worldwide, as well as those who volunteer overseas and donate money to help us save lives and alleviate suffering.



WHAT ABOUT YOUR STUDIES? ALL YOU DO IS REST, REST, REST
I'M INVESTIGATING THE MEANING OF SHABBAT
KRAW

MSF has a strict code of conduct for national and expatriate staff. MSF has always complied with Israeli regulations concerning movements of its aid workers. Bashir had obtained all the required authorizations from Israeli authorities to pass through security checkpoints enabling him to leave Gaza and travel to Jerusalem.

MSF has been working in the Palestinian territories since 1989 to address the violent consequences of the conflict, adhering completely to the principle of neutrality. Our teams provide psychological care along with medical and social services to families experiencing acute trauma and suffering from a lack of access to healthcare. We treat civilians who are exposed regularly and frequently to potentially traumatic conflict-related events. The majority of our patients live in the areas most affected by the violence. Our teams are currently working in Nablus, Hebron and Gaza.

Marilyn McHarg
General Director
Médecins Sans Frontières/Doctors Without Borders Canada

Editor's note: The charges against Mossaab Bashir are only allegations at this stage. We regret any contrary impression that may have arisen from the column, as well as the impression that MSF may be complicit in any inappropriate behaviour.

Rights group responds to Steinberg

Gerald Steinberg ("When aid is exploited for terror," CJN, May 31) is off the mark when he takes Human Rights Watch (HRW) to task for protesting Israeli travel restrictions imposed on Shawan Jabarin, the director of the Palestinian human rights organization Al Haq. True, Israeli military authorities more than two decades ago accused Jabarin of ties to the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP). No one has provided any evidence that he has since had any links with the PFLP or any other political organization. Steinberg then dismisses Al Haq as "radical." Maybe so, but not in the way Steinberg implies. Last July, Al Haq issued a strong and unequivocal condemnation of Palestinian targeting of Israeli civilians under any circumstances. Earlier this month, Al Haq led a group of Palestinian rights organizations in a public letter criticizing efforts by members of the UN Human Rights Council to eliminate country-specific mandates for any country other than Israel – a move that would prevent the council from keeping a spotlight on such egregious human rights violators as Sudan and North Korea.

A letter from Sderot

When I moved to Sderot from Tel Aviv a year ago in order to establish a national institute for leadership training, I knew I was taking a risk. The statistics are quite clear: in the last six years, almost 5,000 missiles have shelled the town. At any given time, one of the 20,000 "registered" residents of Sderot may get hurt. The real number of people who actually live in Sderot is declining.

On Wednesday, May 16 at 9:45 a.m., my house in Sderot was hit by a Qassam missile fired from Gaza. A few days after my house was hit, my neighbour, a 32-year-old woman, was killed by a direct hit of a missile while she was shopping. Shopping in Sderot is one of the most dangerous activities here.

Investing in any aspect of development is what Sderot needs most of all. The residents of Sderot don't need food contributions, blankets or any material donations. The Zionist mission today is to empower us by developing Sderot.

An unimpeachable witness

By JACK CHIVO

Forty years ago, while brave Israel Defence Forces (IDF) paratroopers were fighting to liberate Jerusalem from Jordanian occupation, I was desperately trying to travel to Israel to report from there for the U.S. radio station for which I was working as a foreign correspondent. Unfortunately, there were no seats available on the El Al flights. They were busy ferrying supplies, combat officers and others, all of whom were more needed than a scribbler with a pen, a pad and a tape recorder.

When I arrived a few days later, the Six Day War of June 5-10, 1967, was over and Jerusalem was again a united city where Jews and others could pray in peace, without barbed wires, daily shooting by Jordanian snipers or attacks by PLO terrorists blocking their way. The area in front of the Western Wall was dotted with shabby dwellings, and dirt and rubble were everywhere. Wild vegetation and tons of refuse blocked the access to the holiest site of the Jewish People.

I also saw the remains of the almost 60 synagogues, some dating back many centuries, destroyed and desecrated by the Jordanians after they conquered the Old City in 1948. They had turned some into garbage dumps and animal stables. We were shown gravestones from Jewish cemeteries, including thousands from the Mount of Olives, used to build walls in private houses, even in public toilets, or for paving roads. Many still had the carvings of names and dates, barely legible – testimony to the callousness, even the barbarity of the Arab occupiers.

We also learned that the liberation of Jerusalem, while a great moment in the history of our people, almost did not happen.

Then-prime minister Levi Eshkol, who was concerned about having to fight a war on three fronts after battles with Egypt and Syria started on June 5, 1967, desperately tried to convince Jordan's King Hussein to halt the aggression, which the king had initiated, unprovoked.

Eshkol's pleas for restraint were, however, rejected by the king, who continued to order his artillery, air force and special forces to attack the Jewish area of Jerusalem and beyond, deeper into Israel, causing many military and civilian casualties, until the Israeli defence minister, Moshe Dayan, ordered the IDF to counter-attack. And, as they say, the rest is history!

I was reminded of these events because of recent attempts by some so-called historians and other critics of Israel, including former U.S. president Jimmy Carter, to falsify history and portray the Jewish state as the aggressor and occupier of Palestinian lands. But the evidence is clear. In fighting the Jordanian military offensive and liberating the lands of historic Mandatory Palestine, illegally conquered by the regime in Amman in 1949, Israel was the victim, responding to an unwarranted, brutal attack by Jordan.

Fortunately, there is clear, unimpeachable testimony regarding these events from the best possible source: the Jordanian king himself.

One year after the war, King Hussein wrote a book titled Ma guerre avec Israël, first published in French and afterward translated into other languages. The U.S. edition, printed by the William Morrow publishing house in 1969, was titled My War with Israel. I was one of the correspondents invited to attend the launching of its German edition in 1968, and I still have the volume in my library. For the purpose of this report, however, I will use the English-language edition, to refute the harmful fabrications of the anti-Israel propagandists.

King Hussein's book describes in detail the weeks before the June '67 war: how the Egyptians, especially the president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, and his defence minister, Marshall Amer, were itching to attack and destroy Israel; and the nefarious role played by the PLO in heating up the confrontation by murderous incursions across the border with Israel. To quote King Hussein: "To the many difficulties undermining the work of the United Arab Command [in the days before the '67 conflict] must be added the unfortunate activities of the PLO." He adds that "from 1965 on, the PLO became a state within the Arab states and did as it liked."

The most stunning revelations are, however, included in the pages dealing with the start of the confrontation with Israel when the king was misled by Amer who gave him the "great news" that the Egyptian planes had scored decisive victories against the Israeli air force. Amer challenged the Jordanian monarch to enter the war and participate in the partition and plundering of the Jewish state.

Nobody knows whether King Hussein was fooled by the lies or chose to believe them. Here is his own description of the events, reproduced from the book, beginning on page 60: "At dawn on Monday, June 5, our air force began its task of protecting Jordan's skies… In the blockhouse in the headquarters basement, I carefully examined Marshall Amer's message under the neon lights and then conferred with [Egyptian general Abdul Moneim] Riad [who was there to co-ordinate the offensive by the Jordanian forces] on what moves had already been made.

"'I've given the artillery orders to occupy the front lines,' he said. 'An artillery battalion of the Imam Ali brigade has been ordered to occupy Mount Scopus in Jerusalem [the demilitarized zone since 1948].

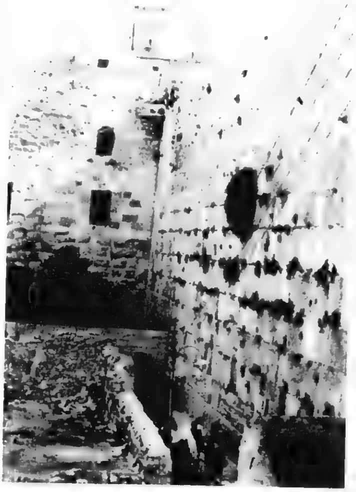
"Mount Scopus was occupied by our troops a short time later. Riad then gave our Hawker Hunters the green light. Their mission, together with the Iraqi and Syrian air forces, was to bomb Israeli air bases in the hope of neutralizing as much as possible the efficiency of the enemy air force…

"It was now 9 a.m. on Monday, June 5, and we were at war. Riad increased our fire power against the Israeli air bases by directing our heavy artillery – long range 155s – on the Israeli air force installations within our line of fire. Our field artillery also went into action, and our Hawker Hunters were ready to take part in the combined operation with the Iraqis and Syrians, beyond their initial incursions."

At this stage of the conflict, in spite of the Jordanian aggression, Israel refrained from any military action, which explains the next paragraph in Hussein's book.

"It was at this point that we received a telephone call at the air force headquarters from UN general Odd Bull. It wad little after 11 a.m.

"The Norwegian general informed me that the Israeli prime minister had addressed an appeal to Jordan. Mr. Eshkol had summarily announced that the Israeli offensive had started that morning, Monday, June 5, with operations directed against the United Arab Republic [the short-lived union between Egypt and Syria]. Eshkol further promised, 'If you don't intervene, you will suffer no consequences.' By that time, we were already fighting in Jerusalem, and our planes had just taken off to bomb Israeli air bases. So I answered Odd Bull: 'They started the battle; well, they are receiving our reply by air!'"



The Western Wall as it appeared on the eve of the Six Day War.

Even after Eshkol's urgent message, and Hussein's rebuff, the Israeli cabinet waited a bit longer, because, as noted by former foreign minister Abba Eban, "We decided to give King Hussein an ultimate chance to turn back."

Rather than seizing this unique opportunity, the Jordanian monarch increased the military action against Israel.

"Three times our Hawker Hunters attacked the bases at Netanya without a loss. And our pilots reported that they had destroyed four enemy planes, the only ones they had seen.

"On their side, the Iraqis bombed the airport at Lydda [Lod]. And a little later, the Syrians finally headed for the base at Ramat David and the refineries at Haifa."

The book records that, after another 90 minutes of waiting, under continuous attacks from the air and on land, and having sustained a number of casualties, Israel struck back with vengeance.

"At 12:30 on that 5th of June came the first Israeli response to the combined bombing by the Jordanians, Iraqis and Syrians. One of the Mirages' objectives was the military airport at Amman."

Suddenly the Jordanians were getting a taste of their own medicine.

"It was 1:10 p.m. A second wave of Israeli bombers attacked the Amman airport, 40 minutes after the first one. It lasted until 3:30. We didn't have a single aircraft left. The Israelis caught them all by surprise as they were taking on fresh ammunition and fuel. They were all destroyed on the ground before they could take off."

There are many other surprising details in the book, including an admission related to the famous conversation between Nasser and King Hussein, in which they decided to concoct the lie that the U.S. and British air forces were helping the Israelis. The Israeli Mossad intercepted the verbal exchange and broadcast it around the world:

Nasser: Should we say the United States and Britain, or only the United States?

Hussein: The United States and Britain.

Nasser: Good. King Hussein will publish a communiqué on this, and I'll publish the same communiqué.

Hussein: Thank you.

Nasser: As God is my witness, I tell you that I shall publish a communiqué and you will publish a communiqué, and we'll see that the Syrians also announce that American and English aircraft are attacking us from their aircraft carriers… We'll really emphasize this point and do it together

Hussein: Good, perfect.

Nasser: A thousand thanks… Our planes have been bombing Israeli airports since early this morning…

Hussein: A thousand thanks. Stay well.

Forty years later, nothing has changed. The Arabs continue to tell lies in their propaganda, and many of Israel's critics and enemies continue to believe the fabrications, no matter how outrageous and blatant they are. And, as demonstrated by King Hussein's refusal to accept Eshkol's offer – to use the famous words of Abba Eban – Israel's enemies still "never miss an opportunity, to miss an opportunity" to make peace with Israel.

Beginnings, endings and Alaska

I recently completed my last official day as chair of the religion department at Concordia University.

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

I had been in the position for four years. They were good years, full of comradeship, silliness, and significance. I made both trivial and momentous decisions – some wise, others misguided. I have looked forward to this day, yet now I am torn, bewildered.

On the one hand, I am eager to rid myself of the constant meetings, of the repetitious and inane reports. On the other hand, I enjoyed meeting colleagues in other parts of the university. I also enjoyed helping to guide my department forward. Weird as it sounds to me, I am sad to leave the position!

The most significant years of my academic life were spent with colleagues in this department. In 1975, I was hired as a part-time teacher. Then I became a graduate student, receiving my PhD in 1995. In 1992, I was hired as a full-time tenure track specialist in women and religion. In all these years, I was supported, encouraged, nurtured and befriended. When I became chair, it was my turn to do my part.

And I did. My research and writing almost stopped. While the administrative side of life is no fun, it wasn't unbearable. It was clear to me that I had the easiest job of all the other chairs. I had a great team. I knew it would be long hours and lots of extra work, but I wasn't distressed. The years were great and I leave a very strong department. (The hardest part was not having the time to go visit my kids or take a vacation.)

So now that I return to all the things I love about academic life, why am I disturbed? There are many factors that diminish my joy at being released from this job. But I think part of me just needs time and ritual to mark the transition.

We eagerly celebrate beginnings, but we don't do so well with endings. Yes, we have serious rituals for the final ending of death. But what about others such as divorce, loss of job, menopause, miscarriages or retirement? It seems to me that we need ritual patterns that will help us transition from one stage of life to another, whether the transition marks a beginning or an ending. We need to mark the moment, highlighting its significance and helping us over the awkward experience of change.

Endings and beginnings are really two sides of the same human coin.

We need to find appropriate ways to share these events of our lives and to put them into context. We err by ignoring the endings. So I am off on a trip to Alaska to mark this transition.

Turkey's lessons for Israel

Recently my e-mail has been deluged with articles about Turkey and the intense confrontation going on there between Islamists and secularists, as well as between the elected government of an Islamic party and the secular army generals. I love the country I lived in for two years. You can't easily figure it out because it is a living, breathing organism with a vigour that amazes me.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Briefly, the argument put forward against Prime Minister Recep Erdogan's government is that he will lead Turkey into an age of religious fundamentalism by manipulating the existing political system and shutting it down. He, so the argument goes, has an agenda similar to that of Saudi Arabia, and Hamas: the implementation of a state based not on western secular principles created by the Ataturk revolution, but on sharia law, which would mean, among other things, the re-enslavement of women behind the veil, the rise of a mullah-led coterie within the government, and a slide backward to an intolerance of non-Muslim minorities.

More dangerously, he is accused of imperilling the entente between Turkey and Israel, and cozying up to people from Hamas and to the anti-Semite and Holocaust denier, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Turkey and Israel have a strong economic and military partnership, and this relationship has shown that a Jewish state can live and do business with a Muslim country.

On the other hand, say Erdogan's supporters, any attempt to undo the election of the current parliament and prime minister is the real step backward. (Note: his Islamist party got 35 per cent of the popular vote, but has 65 per cent of the seats in parliament.)

Army coups in Turkey are always a possibility and have in the past occurred when the generals felt the country had strayed too far from Ataturk's secularist vision. The generals once had one prime minister hanged, his party disbanded and its leaders imprisoned. That, supporters say, was a step away from democracy, and a similar move by the army today would be truly destabilizing.

They also point out that the secular left is very anti-American and often anti-Israel, and many leftists are against joining the European Union, a membership that the Islamist governing party has supported.

Each side is partly right. The EU membership would, it seems, be a boon to Turkey, and an army coup is hardly a democratic move.

And while the wearing of head scarves has increased (not to mention the wearing of full regalia, including veils, at least in villages), many observers note that recent million-person marches clamouring for the country to remain true to its secular ideals have included scarf-wearing women.

So what's the truth about Turkey? It's still a work in progress.

Its women, secular and religious, have come a long way. Its middle class is strong, which is vital for any country that wants a sustainable democracy. It's also rich in natural and human resources. It has some history to sort out, most glaringly the need to come to terms with the Armenian genocide and with its Kurdish population. Yet, what other Muslim country can we think of that has come so far into the western world?

But why am I even writing about a situation that is seemingly so far away from us?

Because it is precisely such a nuanced approach that we must apply to Israel.

It too has its religious right, its fundamentalists, its resolute secularists, its traditionalists and its own anti-Zionists (religious and secular). It is also no stranger to radicals, such as those behind the hateful assassination of prime minister Yitzchak Rabin. It has its seemingly endless struggle with the Palestinians. It has its tension between civil and military authority, although no general has needed to stage a coup – they just run for office. It has byzantine corruption, nasty inequality for women (not to mention tolerance for sexual harassment), and yet it boasts a vibrant civil society.

Israel is not a dream palace, but a real place, where all these currents jostle for influence. People get up in the morning, brush their teeth and go to work. Like Turkey, Israel deserves our considered appraisal, not doomsday scenarios or unqualified praise.

She – and we – will survive.

Religion and human rights

In Canada and particularly in Quebec, there has been considerable controversy recently about the rights afforded to minority religions and the notion of "reasonable accommodation" as applied to these minorities. Not surprisingly, some of these issues have ended up in the courts.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Over the past 25 years since the advent of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, religious concerns have been argued in our courts by members of the Jewish community, the Jehovah's Witnesses faith, those minorities seeking government funding of secondary education, fundamentalist Christians and others. The latest challenge presently before the courts relates to members of a Hutterite Brethren colony in rural Alberta.

The Hutterites believe in rural communal living somewhat akin to a kibbutz. In the early 1970s, the Hutterites justifiably objected to provincial legislation restricting the amount of communal landholding in Alberta. The Communal Property Act was specifically directed at Hutterites and Doukhobors, although, since there were no Doukhobors in Alberta at that time, it was essentially aimed at Hutterites. The case, Walter v. Alberta, went to the Supreme Court of Canada and was decided in favour of the Alberta government. Of course, there was no constitutionally entrenched Charter of Rights and Freedoms protecting religious minorities at the time. In any event, the offending act was subsequently repealed.

Another issue affecting mostly Hutterites has now emerged. It involves a challenge to a recent Alberta regulation requiring photographs on Alberta driver's licences. Photographs became an integral part of the Alberta driver's licence in 1974, although there was provision for an allowable exemption. In 2003, the exemption provision was removed and photographs became mandatory for all. The photo identification on drivers' licences was meant to assist law enforcement officials in the prevention and investigation of fraud and identity theft.

This requirement offends members of the Hutterite faith who believe that being photographed is contrary to the second of the Ten Commandments prohibiting the making "for yourself an idol, or any likeness."

In the case, Hutterite Brethern of Wilson County vs. Alberta, both the Alberta Court of Queen's Bench and the Alberta Court of Appeal (the province's highest court) held that the photograph requirement was a violation of the Hutterites' freedom of religion under Section 2(a) of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Moreover, the regulation could not be saved under Section 1 of the Charter as a "reasonable limit" in a "free and democratic society." As a result, the removal of the exemption of the mandatory photographic requirement was held to be of no force and effect. It is likely that this case will be appealed further to the Supreme Court of Canada.

The Alberta Court of Appeal decision attracted considerable national attention in the media, including critical editorial reaction.

In confronting laws and government practices that threaten the rights of religious minorities, the prevailing reaction is that society must take steps to reasonably accommodate the sensitivities of those minorities.

Given the recent reaction to the notion of reasonable accommodation in general, and to the Hutterite Brethren case in particularly, it may be that we are seeing the emergence of a backlash to some of these minority religious assertions. This is particularly important to chassidic Jews in Quebec who have been somewhat assertive in the past two years in arguing for religious minority rights.

We do not really know whether these minority religious assertions and the notion of reasonable accommodation will become acceptable over the long run in a society that, on one hand, respects religious minorities, but on the other hand, is essentially secular in nature. Religious minorities are winning the day now and reasonable accommodation has become the acceptable norm.

But will this continue to prevail? The Hutterite Brethren case had a strong dissenting opinion at the Court of Appeal level. And, as the Globe and Mail subsequently asserted, "It's a balancing act. If the majority [of the judges of that court] had been willing to give more weight to Alberta's obligation to the public to protect driver's licences from abuse, the Hutterite Brethren, not the system safeguarding those licences, would have had to make the greater accommodation".

At this point, one can only speculate whether Canadian society will actively continue to support the accommodation of minority religious rights.

The Kirshner File

Reflections on the Six Day War

Forty years on, the Six Day War can now be regarded as a watershed whose far-reaching consequences could not be foreseen in 1967. Widely viewed by Israelis as an existential struggle for sheer survival, the decisive outcome of the war seemed to improve Israel's security and enhance its legitimacy. By capturing vast swaths of territory – the Sinai Peninsula, the Gaza Strip, the West Bank and the Golan Heights – in a brilliant feat of arms, Israel established itself as the preeminent and undisputed military power in the Middle East.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

For the first time in its brief and tumultuous history as a Jewish state, Israel appeared secure and indomitable, its place in the region apparently unchallenged. For a fleeting moment, Israelis could feel confident, euphoric and even heroic. The Israeli armed forces, consisting primarily of reservists, had vanquished a coalition of Arab armies, spearheaded by Egypt, bent on Israel's destruction. And now, basking in Israel's David-and-Goliath triumph, Israelis could flock to Jewish ancestral lands and places of biblical import that had been off limits to them since the 1948 War of Independence.

There was even speculation that the Arabs, having been shocked, stunned and flummoxed by Israel's military prowess, might finally come to terms with Israel and bring closure to a long simmering dispute that had exacted far too much blood, treasure and suffering.

Whatever hopes and illusions Israelis harboured were rudely ruptured by the hand of reality. Less than three months after the Arabs' shattering defeat and Israel's offer to return some of the territories, an Arab League summit in Khartoum issued a ringing, recalcitrant declaration utterly rejecting peace with, recognition of, and negotiations with Israel.

The three no's of Khartoum were followed by frantic diplomatic efforts at the United Nations – a body not known to be overly sympathetic to Israel – to defuse the imbroglio. Security Council Resolution 242 called for Israel's withdrawal from territories acquired in the war in exchange for Arab acceptance of Israel. The land-for-peace formula, which forms the basis of Middle East diplomacy today, was lauded as a breakthrough and a harbinger of normalization between Israel and the Arab world. Yet this was not to be.

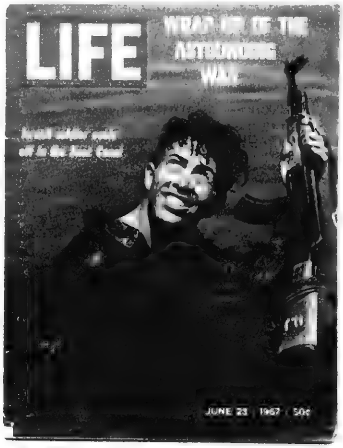
Israel succumbed to the messianic allure of settling the territories, which fuelled Arab suspicions that it was not serious about peace. Conversely, the Arab refusal to engage Israel in direct talks stoked Israeli fears that their real aim was Israel's destruction. As the dust settled, the Soviet Union – which contributed to the outbreak of the war by falsely claiming that Israel had massed troops on the Syrian border in preparation for an attack– took immediate steps to rearm its two client states, Egypt and Syria. Egyptian and Syrian forces had sustained huge losses, and now Moscow was trying to bolster its credibility and tinker with the balance of power in the region.

By the autumn of that seminal year, the stirrings of an Arab backlash were being felt by Israel on several fronts. In Sinai, Egypt launched pinprick commando raids, artillery barrages and air attacks. Israel responded in kind and constructed the defensive Bar-Lev line. Within a year, the president of Egypt, Gamal Abdul Nasser, who had blundered into the war, announced the commencement of the War of Attrition. It would claim the lives of hundreds of Israeli servicemen, and many more Egyptian soldiers, and would not end until the summer of 1970, when the United States intervened and imposed a ceasefire on the combatants. On the Golan, meanwhile, fighting continued to rage intermittently.

Of more concern to Israel was the situation in the West Bank and Gaza, both of which were inhabited by Palestinians. The war had jolted the Palestinians – who had been dispossessed by the 1948 war – and reinforced their identity and yearning for nationhood. Their representative organization, the PLO, which had been created in the mid-1960s by the Arab League, masterminded a mini uprising in the West Bank and Gaza that foreshadowed the intifadahs of 1987 and 2000.

Israel suppressed the 1967 rebellion in short order, prompting the PLO to build bases in Jordan from which to attack Israeli settlements. Israel hit back. In some instances, Jordan's army, the Arab Legion, joined the fray. The problem was exacerbated by the Palestinians' decision to establish a beachhead in southern Lebanon, which was inexorably drawn into the conflagration.

As the historian Michael Oren correctly observes, the Six Day War ushered in deadlier conflicts, of which the 1973 Yom Kippur War was a prime example. Determined to regain the Sinai, and frustrated by Israel's disinterest in its 1972 peace proposals, Egypt – and Syria – initiated hostilities. Their objective was to break the status quo, which Israel complacently preferred.



The Yom Kippur War bloodied Israel, broke its aura of invincibility, proved that territory is not necessarily synonymous with security, and emboldened the United States to sponsor a series negotiations that brought a measure of stability, however tenuous, to the area. Israel's historic disengagement pacts with Egypt and Syria opened the door for Israeli withdrawals from the Sinai and the Golan, jump-started the process leading to Israel's peace treaty with Egypt and solidified Israel's strategic relationship with the United States, despite an incident during which Israeli jets attacked the USS Liberty, an intelligence gathering vessel. But the war left the Palestinian problem festering and led to Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon.

The Six Day War greatly inspired Islamic fundamentalists and religious Zionists, both of whom are wedded to ideological imperatives.

Islamists saw the ignominious Arab defeat as an unmistakable sign of the failure of secular Arab nationalism. It would take Saddam Hussein, with his ill-considered invasion of Kuwait in 1990, to drive the last nail into its coffin. But in the meantime, Israel's victory convinced many Arabs – and Iranians – that Islam is the solution.

This sectarian approach to temporal problems has had an enormous impact throughout the Muslim world. Islamists overthrew the pro-Western Pahlavi monarchy in Iran, attempted to oust the Baathist regime in Syria, fomented a short-lived revolt in Egypt and a civil war in Algeria, and seized power in Afghanistan and the Palestinian Authority. And lest we forget, Al Qaeda was formed in the stew of this toxic brew.

In Israel, messianic fervour played no small role in influencing successive governments to tighten their grip on the territories. Having returned to Hebron, eastern Jerusalem and the like, religious Zionists, allied with secular nationalists, won permission to construct and expand settlements in the West Bank and Gaza, and thus set Israel's agenda.

Of late, Israelis have had second thoughts about the wisdom of clinging to the territories, realizing that the building of settlements and the attainment of peace are diametrically opposed, and that the retention of the West Bank is bound to block prospects for a realistic rapprochement with Palestinians ready to coexist with Israel. More importantly, as former prime minister Ariel Sharon realized before relinquishing Gaza in 2005, the occupation of densely Arab-inhabited areas poses a long term threat to Israel's status as a Jewish and democratic state.

Forty years ago, few Israelis could have predicted that the conquest of the new territories would bring more problems than solutions. Nor could they have known that Israel – judging by last summer's inconclusive war in Lebanon and Israel's current failure to crush the Qassam rocket launchers of Hamas and Islamic Jihad – might be perceived to be as or more vulnerable than it was prior to the Six Day War.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

> "In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.
>
> The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.
>
> Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

The mitzvah of challah

By RABBI MEIR ROSENBERG

Rabbinic Reflections

How many of us remember a grandmother or a mother baking challah for Shabbat? The aroma, the taste and the feeling was unbelievable!

There are many Jewish women who still bake challah today. The mitzvah of challah, however, is not limited to erev Shabbat or yom tov, but is mandatory every time one bakes bread.

The Torah commands that from every batch of dough (approximately three pounds worth) made with one of the five types of grain (wheat, barley, spelt, rye and oats) a portion – commonly known as challah (though today we call the whole loaf challah, in the Torah, the word challah actually refers to the portion of dough that is separated from the batch) – be given to the Kohanim (priests) who serve God full time and depend on these portions as their only means of sustenance.

Today, all Jews are presumed to be in a state of ritual impurity, and therefore, the priests are no longer allowed to eat the challah that is separated from the dough. For this reason, our current custom is to separate a small amount of dough and then bake it until it is burnt. In this inedible state, it is discarded.

In parshat Shelach, Torah provides various details of this mitzvah not just in one verse, but in a complete portion. In the Mishnah, an entire tractate is dedicated to this mitzvah and is called Mesechta Challah. It gives the general guidelines of this special mitzvah. Although many of the 613 mitzvot are mentioned very concisely and briefly in the Torah, the mitzvah of challah is clarified at considerable length and in detail.

What does the mitzvah of challah entail that it should be so deserving of discussion? The primary food staple is bread, the staff of life. Therefore, in Hebrew, the entire meal is called "bread," as the Torah relates of the Egyptians that they could not bear to eat bread with the Jews, since it was despicable to them. In actuality, only Jewish meat was despised (the lamb that we used for the Pesach sacrifice was the Egyptian deity), yet the entire meal is called "bread."

The mitzvah of challah conveys a timely lesson for every Jew, man and woman – even for those not involved in baking – in our service to God. That is, before a Jew prepares dough for a meal, which in the broader sense includes all of one's material needs, the first and best part of everything should be separated for God.

A Jew must realize that his challah - his first priority in time and importance – is what he separates and gives to God, whether it's one's energy, money or support of holy endeavours in the realm of Torah and its observance. This is not just a theological expression, but is quite clearly expressed in the Shulchan Aruch, the Code of Jewish Law.

The reward for this mitzvah ends where it began – in the home, as the prophet Ezekiel states, "to cause a blessing to rest in your home."

May this most sweet smelling of blessings be found in all of our Jewish homes.

A double scoop of random kindness

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

One Shabbat afternoon several years ago, my family was enjoying time in the park with another family.

As the day got late, an ice cream truck came ding-a-linging along and stopped – no surprise – in front of all the kids playing.

Coincidentally, our son and his friend had just had an argument a few moments earlier, and we proudly watched as they worked it out with words and compromises. As they walked toward us, hand in hand, all the parents agreed that in theory, ice cream would be just the right thing for this special moment. But it was Shabbat, and neither family uses money on Shabbat.

The boys approached, wide-eyed and expectant. We reminded them that it was Shabbat, and we had no money.

They said, with complete child-like innocence, "What if we explain to the ice cream truck driver that it's Shabbat and we can't pay him today, but we can pay him tomorrow?"

My inclination was to shield the kids from embarrassment and failure, but instead I said, "Go ahead and see what happens."

"Excuse me, are you Jewish?" they asked the 18-year-old driver.

"No," he answered.

Realizing the seriousness of the mission, they continued. "Well, we are Jewish, and today is our special day, called Shabbat. It comes once a week, on Saturday, and to make this day special we don't use money, although we are allowed to have ice cream. We were wondering if we could get just one cone today and come back tomorrow to pay for it."

That ice cream truck driver had 30 seconds to make a decision. He could have followed the rules and explained that if he gives them ice cream without paying for it, every kid would want the same treatment, and he'd get in trouble, and his boss wouldn't like it, and it's not his truck (he's only renting it), and as the kids say, "yada yada yada."

Instead, he smiled broadly and gave the kids not one, but two ice cream cones. I still can see the utter joy with which those kids ran to us. They were so proud to be Jewish, and they were proud that they were proud! Someone from the "grown up" world had validated them as trustworthy people and given them respect. They were touched that this stranger had done a simple act of kindness for them.

Some parents wouldn't have allowed this kind of exchange on Shabbat, and I respect that. The point of the story is not to illustrate creative ways to "get around" Shabbat. The point is, rather, how easy it is to make someone else happy, how a "random act of kindness" changes the world, and how simplicity and trust still exist.

Tradition teaches that before the Messiah comes, Elijah will herald that special day. But in order to see if we are really ready for a better world, Elijah will come in disguise.

The very next day, we returned to the park to pay the ice cream man, but he wasn't there. He wasn't there for the whole following week. In fact, he never came back.

We don't want to believe he was fired. "What do you think happened?" I asked my son.

He answered, "It's obvious. That ice cream man was Elijah."

Now every time someone does a simple act of kindness, our family believes we have seen the face of Elijah. And in return for that gift, we remind ourselves all the time that we should try to "be Elijah" for someone else.

Free schooling is a communal duty

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The ever-increasing cost of Jewish education has been the focus of many articles recently, including at least three in this newspaper's May 25 edition.

But the unaffordable cost for many in our community of attaining a Jewish education is not a new phenomenon. The Talmud (Bava Batra 21a) explains that since the obligation to teach one's children is a parental duty, in the early years of our history, "whoever did not have a [learned] father did not learn Torah." While to moderns this seems rather unbelievable, in the ancient world, formal education was the privilege of the few.

Apparently, many Jews "learned" by societal osmosis, witnessing the practices of their parents and the Jewish community around them. They, unlike Jews today, could be practising Jews even if they were ignorant Jews.

Yet such a "system" was doomed to fail. The first-century high priest Yehoshua ben Gamla thus instituted universal free Jewish education, with the costs being borne by the community at large. This act, which became the model for our contemporary public school system, where every child is guaranteed a free education, was simple, brilliant and the most important enactment in all of Jewish history. Without it, there would, in fact, be no Jewish history.

The Talmud, in assessing the importance of universal free Jewish education, states simply: "Remember that man [he was apparently not learned himself] for good and his name is Yehoshua ben Gamla, for if not for him, Torah would have been forgotten from Israel."

The Talmud states the obvious – and often it's the obvious that must be stated the most often – that if not for Yehoshua ben Gamla's decree mandating universal free Jewish education, there would no Torah, no Judaism and no Jewish people. Jewish history would have ceased with the destruction of the Temple.

Amazingly, this decree was enacted a mere six years before that destruction, when the Jewish community seemingly had much more serious issues – issues of physical survival – to deal with. But Yehoshua ben Gamla understood that there can be no greater threat to Jewish survival than ignorance.

Coupled with the successful plea of Yehoshua's contemporary, Rabbi Yochanan ben Zakkai, to set up an academy of higher Jewish learning in the coastal city of Yavneh, rabbinic Judaism was able to survive, and even thrive, despite the destruction of Judaism's most beautiful and important building, the Temple. The many Jewish sects of the time soon faded into oblivion, interesting only scholars of the Second Temple period. Had the Romans understood that Judaism can survive without the gleaming temples – but not without Jewish education – they might have spared the temple and concentrated on closing down Jewish schools.

While many believe that Jewish tuition fees should be treated as user fees to be paid by those who use the Jewish education system, our tradition teaches otherwise. It's a tradition that the rest of the world has copied from us. It's time we copy it back from them.

While contemporary Jewish communities (outside Israel) lack the power to tax their members, the unprecedented resources that exist within our community allow us, if we can find the will, to guarantee "Birthright Education" to every Jewish child, similar to free birthright israel trips to the Holy Land for young Jewish adults.

It will take a concerted effort involving the entire community – nothing less will do when the future of Judaism is at stake. Study after study has shown that Jewish education and involvement in, and commitment to, the Jewish community at large are intimately related.

The Talmud (Shabbat 119b) teaches that "the world continues to exist only because of children learning Torah."

Are we up to the challenge of Jewish history?

Israel and the environment

The Jewish Highway

We like to think of it as the Land Flowing with Milk and Honey. But unless Israel faces up to its environmental challenges, far more dangerous substances will flow through the country's rivers, lakes and taps.

Today, a look at some of Israel environmental challenges, initiatives and successes.

I recommend starting at the Jewish Global Environmental Network. The articles are well written, interesting and challenging. Alon Tal of Ben Gurion University looks at the possible effects of global climate change on Israel, which include agricultural devastation, very hot summers and beach erosion. Tal does mention some eco-friendly initiatives, such as a plan to create Israel's first solar power plant in the Negev desert, but ends on an ominous note. "Even if Israel does its share, global warming is primed to affect Israeli life dramatically. Emissions released in places far across the sea, including by Israel's friends in America, will alter Israel's land, its plants and animals, its weather, and its people." [www.jgenisrael.org/]

You get a more upbeat view of the country at the Ministry of Environmental Protection website. For example, 84 per cent of the country's beaches (which are not patrolled by lifeguards) have been deemed "very clean." Only six per cent are considered "dirty" and none "very dirty." [http://tinyurl.com/33f8m9] For in-depth coverage of the state of the environment from the government's perspective, you can download the glossy Environmental Bulletins. [http://tinyurl.com/374hl8]

Although it may not come to mind immediately, the Jewish National Fund has been involved in environmental change in Israel for more than a century. The JNF is best known for its planting forests and making the desert bloom. I was interested to read about a more recent JNF project. When I was growing up, I was taught how the JNF was able to dry up the Hula lake and marshlands. While the region gained an additional 16,500 acres of arable farmland, the Sea of Galilee lost the Hula lake, a natural filter for waters flowing into the sea. A decade ago, the JNF sought to correct its error and reflooded some of the area. [http://tinyurl.com/2m3u6t]

There are other lesser known Israeli environmental organizations.

- The Council for a Beautiful Israel protects the natural beauty of Israel, preserves historical sites and develops public recreation sites and gardens. [www.israel-yafa.org.il]
- Green Action promotes "socio-ecological change through direct non-violent action, community service and youth empowerment." [http://tinyurl. com/ 32js3l]
- The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies prepares "future Arab and Jewish leaders to co-operatively solve the region's environmental challenges." [www.arava.org/new/]
- Green Course: Students for the Environment has "6,000 volunteer students in 24 chapters in universities and colleges across Israel." [www.green.org.il/eng/] (Interesting addendum at the bottom of Green Course's homepage: "This new website has been made possible through the generous support of the First Narayever Congregation – Toronto.")

You may not live in Israel, but you can have an impact (or less of one) the next time you visit. Consider biking it. Israel for Bicycles' goal is to make Israel's cities bike-friendly, and improve the country's quality of life and road safety. [www.bike.org.il/] If you're up to it, consider tackling the Israel Bike Trail, an 850-kilometre route that reaches from the slopes of Mount Hermon in the north to Eilat's Almog Beach in the south. [http://tinyurl.com/2k6e6c]

The Jerusalem Center for Public Affairs presents some forward-thinking articles about Israel's future and the environment. One that caught my eye was Environmental Change in the Messianic Era. We are all familiar with the vision that foretells a fundamental change in nature when the "wolf shall dwell with the lamb, the leopard lie down with the kid" (Isaiah 11:6). As for the food supply in the End of Days, a midrash says that "when the Messiah arrives, there will be a harvest every month and the trees will give fruit every two months." Aside from that, Ezekiel prophesies that foul waters will become healthy ones. (Ezekiel 47:12) [www.jcpa.org/jep.htm]

Until then, there's work to be done and plenty of Israeli environmental organizations determined to do it. [http://tinyurl.com/34jgjf]

The assisted suicide of CJC: does it matter?

By MICHAEL BROWN

Guest Voice

Should we laugh or cry?

The May 25 issue of The CJN reported that abolishing popular participation – elections, that is – in Canadian Jewish Congress will, according to some, "make CJC [a] 'dynamic, new institution.'"

Does anyone buy that?

Congress was once the pride of Canadian Jewry, the kind of organization that American Jews have been never been able to establish, a truly representative body. It marked us as unique.

With the exception of the extreme left, Congress encompassed all Canadian Jews, secular and religious (all stripes), left-wing and right-wing, socialist and capitalist, rich and poor, newcomer and "pure laine," Zionist and non-Zionist. Quite legitimately, it could claim to speak for us all.

And now, assisted suicide is proposed for the parliament of the Jewish people of Canada, which would end its role as a representative communal spokesperson and give it a new role as the mouthpiece for those "who know best."

The last vestige of Canadian-Jewish communal democracy is about to die, only to be reborn as an arm of CIJA – the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy – and local Jewish federations.

The move would not simply formalize a shift of power in the community, it would deprive "the people" of any voice at all. It will mark the final step in the (Jewish) Americanization of Canadian Jewry, the move from democracy to paternalistic plutocracy.

"So what?" you may ask. In fact, the end of Canadian-Jewish democracy is likely to have unpleasant consequences.

In 1947, Winston Churchill said that democracy "is the worst form of government except for all those other forms that have been tried from time to time." He made this statement just two years after being turfed out of office by the electorate, despite his brilliant and inspiring wartime leadership.

To be sure, democracy is inefficient. Elected leaders are often chosen for reasons other than their leadership skills. And the way of the world is that "he who pays the piper calls the tune."

But self-appointed leaders and those chosen by small groups of people "in the know" in governments, business, academia or other settings have proven no more capable on the whole, and sometimes they have proven themselves to be less capable, because there are no checks and balances on their power. For evidence, read the front pages of our dailies any day of the week.

The same issue of The CJN that reported the death of Congress as we have known it contained a report about a new study by two sociologists on the affiliation – or, more accurately, non-affiliation – patterns of young Jewish adults in North America.

The study documents their lack of interest in communal institutions and in traditional patterns of behaviour. Other studies document the declining interest in Israel on the part of young Jews and the alarming rate of intermarriage. Our community notables are forever expressing dismay at their inability to communicate with the young.

What better way to ensure the alienation of growing numbers of Jews than to deprive them of even a feeble voice in the community, even in a now largely toothless (because it's penniless) organization?

Can anyone really imagine that the way to get the unaffiliated to "buy into" the community is to make decisions for them, since they couldn't possibly understand their own needs, to say nothing of the needs of other Jews? Deprived of a voice, they will continue to vote with their feet.

So what about those who foot the bill? Should they not have a say in how things are done?

They should, indeed. But in a democratic society, we don't give extra votes to those who pay the most taxes. There are other legitimate ways for them to exert influence.

Their voice will be heard above that of others, simply because they have easy access to those in power.

In a voluntary group such as the Jewish community, people can (and do) choose to support only the activities that they approve of. And there are appropriate rewards and honours for those who give generously of their time and money for the good of us all. But that doesn't mean the rank and file should be deprived of a voice.

Congress is not what it once was. But because of its historic role in this country, it retains some clout in the community and as its representative. That leadership positions are being eagerly contested by respected members of the community is a sign of vitality.

But turning Congress into a puppet will make it neither "dynamic" nor effective. It will be just be one more turn-off for the increasing numbers of Jews who are not attracted to the organized community.

Let the people continue to speak. Democracy is still the best form of communal government.

Dinner to raise funds for Laniado Hospital

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Israel's Laniado Hospital is 30 years old, and its Canadian supporters are hosting a tribute dinner to fundraise for a new pediatric trauma unit in its children's facility.

Hilda Weil

"I'm hoping this evening will raise the profile of Laniado in our community by helping people understand how unique the hospital is and how important their support is," said Dani Weil, president of the Canadian Friends of Laniado Hospital.

Laniado Hospital is the only hospital in Netanya, a coastal city with a population of 250,000 people. It has a full medical campus, including a nursing school and two geriatric care centres, as well as a children's hospital.

The Canadian Friends' dinner is being held June 11 at Beth Avraham Yoseph in Thornhill in memory of Weil's mother, Hilda Weil, who died unexpectedly last year.

Hilda was a teacher at the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto and helped develop its Hebrew program.

Last year, she made aliyah to Israel, but she passed away while the family was helping her move.

Dani said that since most of her friends were still in Toronto and his mother died in Israel, they did not have a chance to visit the shivah and express their condolences.

"My mother always looked at things in a positive light. We wanted to use that to some form of good, and do something in her memory that would benefit," Dani said.

His father, Dr. Joseph Weil, was the first medical director of Laniado Hospital.

The fundraising goal for the evening is $1 million dollars. The new trauma unit of the children's hospital opened last month and is fully functional.

The keynote speaker for the evening is Rabbi Zvi Elimelech Halberstam, the Sanz Rebbe, and son of the original Sanz Rebbe, who helped found the hospital. It's Rabbi Halberstam's first visit to Toronto. Dani will also be speaking at the evening.

Special needs people get 'tools' to fit into society

Israel Elwyn provides unique service in Israel

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

David Marcu, executive director of Israel Elwyn, an organization in Israel that serves children and adults with special needs, says his most important job is giving people the tools to become independent.

Here recently to attend the annual meeting of Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn, Marcu said he also wants to take his clients from "being stigmatized to feeling proud."

Serving about 1,700 children and adults, Israel Elwyn's services include preschool development centres, education services, work activity centres, adult development centres, supported employment services, job placement and vocational training, supported group homes, residential services and transitional employment.

Marcu was honoured as this year's recipent of the Bernie Rosenthal Executive Director Award, for outstanding leadership in Jewish vocational services, at a joint conference of the Association of Jewish Families and Children's Agencies and the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services, held recently in New York City.

Originally from Philadelphia, Pa., Marcu has been with Israel Elwyn since 1984, and he has been its executive director for 13 years. He said the organization is founded on the belief that "everyone deserves the chance to be an active participant in society through inclusive rather than exclusive interaction."

David Marcu

The organization gets government funding, he said, but it's responsible for raising funds for physical improvements, such as renovating or building a new facility.

"We're always trying to raise money for new equipment and new programs."

One of the newest programs, he said, is for seniors who are developmentally delayed. "Life expectancy has changed because of improved medical care. These seniors are living to a ripe old age, but their needs change. They might, for example, need new accommodations at their job."

Israel Elwyn is now building the first centre in Israel for seniors with disabilities – it should be ready by the beginning of next year – on land donated by the municipality of Jerusalem, he said.

"This gives people a chance to retire. If they had been attending our work centre, they might want to move on and take advantage of our programs such as physio, occupational or recreational therapy."

The centre is in the middle of a residential neighbourhood, said Marcu, "so they have contact with the neighbours. We want it to be as inclusive as possible."

At another Elwyn program, the goal is to work with children and their families at early intervention centres – there are two in Jerusalem and two in Haifa – in order to integrate special needs kids into mainstream classrooms.

"We work closely with parents, because they are the most important factor in their children's success."

Israel Elwyn's employment program has 300 people working in a variety of jobs, he said. "They are able to work because they have a job coach who offers them support and assistance on the job. This is a huge thing for people who might otherwise not be able to work."

As a member of the International Association of Jewish Vocational Services, his organization has a good relationship with JVS Toronto, Marcu said.

"We share ideas and best practices, and JVS also serves as our headquarters in Toronto."

Marcu said Israel Elwyn and Canadian Friends of Israel Elwyn are always looking for volunteers. Call 416-787-1151, ext. 300 for information.

Susan Horvath heads Mount Sinai Foundation

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Susan Horvath, the recently installed president of the Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation, is excited about a project that will add six floors to the hospital's main tower.

The project, Renew Sinai, will also provide new and improved equipment and add new hospital services.

Horvath, who became foundation president on March 19, said that Mount Sinai's combination of research and health care set it apart from other facilities. For instance, she noted that the heel-prick test, developed at Mount Sinai, which checks infants for a number of potential diseases and conditions is "now internationally used, was developed and quickly came into common use here."

Susan Horvath

Molecular geneticist Irene Andrulis, Horvath said, is working at Mount Sinai's Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute on a blood test to detect breast cancer at a very early stage.

The hospital, she stressed, determines what's needed in terms of funding. "There is input from all areas of the hospital, and so priorities have to be set."

The fundraiser has to take those needs into account, Horvath said, but also must consider that donors have special interests and passions themselves, or might be interested in a certain aspect of a project.

"I love matching organizational priorities with donor philosophies, and working with someone to accomplish a dream they have."

She said she will meet with past donors, show how the money they gave before is being used and see what they might like to do next.

Sometimes donors approach the foundation with a project they might be interested in, because of their own personal histories – for instance, someone who had a long hospital stay might want to make the rooms more inviting.

Horvath stressed that she is not just interested in getting big donors. "I got good training at the United Way. For some people, $20 might be a huge sacrifice."

While people may be taken aback at the tremendous costs involved in new technologies, Horvath said, they may well lead to huge savings, both in time and money.

Genetic testing, she said, through the power of computers can be carried out in a matter of hours and at a much lower cost than older techniques.

Horvath has a clear-eyed set of personal goals including building on Mount Sinai's philanthropic traditions of the past and helping to continue the long tradition of volunteerism that is a part of the hospital's history.

Horvath, who has a BSc from the University of Western Ontario and an MS from the University of Alberta in home economics, served on the faculty of UWO for 10 years.

"I couldn't see myself doing that forever," she said. "So I decided to try something new." She accepted a position at the United Way, and "I loved fundraising from day one."

From 2001, Horvath was in charge of fundraising and public relations for the Robarts Research Institute in London, Ont. She established a major gifts program there and raised more than $35 million to support medical research.

In a Mount Sinai press release, she calls her new position "a fundraiser's dream."

Not that she has a lot of spare time, but in the little she does have, Horvath likes cooking, maintaining her fitness and reading.

Horvath mused about the new stage of life she has entered with her new position. "My children are launched, my husband and I will be establishing a home here – it is all very exciting," she said.

Israeli 'Mr. Wizard' introduces science to kids

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The enthusiasm Mordechai (Macky) Goldman exhibits when he conducts science experiments is unmistakable.

Fredericton, N.B.-born Goldman, known as the Israeli "Mr. Wizard," was in Toronto late last month to perform experiments during a show at Shaarei Shomayim Congregation. The original "Mr. Wizard" was made famous by Don Hebert, the American creator of the 1950s television show Watch Mr. Wizard.

Although both the original "Mr. Wizard" and Goldman work toward the same goal of introducing the wonders of science to children, he doesn't want his demonstrations associated with "wizardry" or "magic." Rather than refer to it as a magical chemistry show, he prefers the "magic of chemistry."

After years as a chemist, a teacher and even a farmer, 60-year-old Goldman is now hoping to make a career out of exposing children to the relationship between God and nature.

"Chemistry is about a love of creating, and I call it a partnership with the creator," Goldman said.

Goldman moved to Toronto to earn his bachelor's degree in 1968, and after obtaining a PhD in chemistry in 1975, he made aliyah with his wife Barbara and his two children.

He moved his family to a settlement called Elazar in Gush Etzion, near Jerusalem, before they settled in Gush Katif, where Goldman worked as a farmer.

"We moved to Nezter Hazani in Gush Katif, where I lived for four years, and then we moved to Be'er Sheva to actually give up on a dream of raising our family on a moshav, which was very attractive to us, in order to find long-term work."

With his PhD in chemistry, he said he got a job with an Israeli chemical company, but he also taught an after-school science program and a weekly chemistry class for gifted children.

"That actually started a war between teaching and working in chemistry that has carried me through my entire professional life," Goldman said.

He said he wasn't sure when this occurred to him, but he wanted to have hands-on experience in chemistry so that he could go back into the classroom and use that knowledge to get kids turned onto chemistry.

"But that was only one of my goals," he said. "I don't think it should be called a unique approach, because anyone could and should be using it, but I use chemistry as a tool to get people turned on to the wonders of God and nature. I try to encourage them to open their eyes to what there is in the material world and at the same time to realize that it didn't just happen to fall into place."

It wasn't until 1991 that Goldman enrolled in a chemical education course that would lead him to fulfil his passion of engaging youth in science.

"Ultimately, this is what I decided: If I was going to be a teacher, I'd have to have my hand somehow in practical chemistry."

It was then that Goldman developed a relationship with Irwin Talesnick, a Toronto-based chemist and a retired Queen's University professor, who runs a company called S17 Science Supplies and Services, which provides teachers with chemicals that are often hard to find.

Mordechai Goldman, right, with Irwin Talesnick

Talesnick, who shares Goldman's passion for scientific demonstrations, said he's been doing shows for close to 50 years.

Last year, Talesnick spent two weeks in Singapore doing chemistry sessions at the Singapore Science Centre for children and teachers.

When Goldman decided to come back to Toronto to do a show at Shaarei Shomayim, he asked Talesnick to get involved because they've never had a chance to work together.

To demonstrate the kinds of experiments he conducts for the kids, Goldman pulled out a burner and lowered a beaker over a hot flame in the living room of his brother's home.

"You put a little bit of water into the flask and place the balloon over the flask's mouth. When the water boils, you'd expect the balloon to expand, but instead, it becomes smaller," Goldman said.

He explained that as the bottle cools, the balloon is sucked into the bottle and inflates to fill the entire inside of the bottle. At the start of the experiment, the water vapour from the boiling water forced the balloon to expand outside the flask. But as it cooled, the pressure outside the flask became greater than the pressure inside, creating a vacuum.

As he does with most of his experiments, Goldman attempted to tie a Torah-based lesson to it.

"A person who is extremely modest doesn't want anyone to know about the good things that he does. They call him nechba alhakirim, he is clinging to the wall," he said, translating from Hebrew to English.

"In terms of a message here, I would give a general one and say that something as simple as a balloon, and blowing it up, shows them aspects of nature that they weren't aware of."

Vancouver day school holds reunion in T.O.

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Attention graduates of the Vancouver Talmud Torah School (VTT): the day school is holding its first-ever reunion in Toronto, and all alumni living in southern Ontario are invited.

The brunch, which takes place June 10 at 11: 30 a.m. at the home of Sherry Firestone, is being organized by Vancouver resident David Bogoch, chair of the VTT alumni committee.

Bogoch, who graduated in 1968, says after Vancouver and Israel, the largest number of VTT graduates reside in the Toronto area.

"Out of 72 invites mailed out, we have more than 40 people coming. We're hoping for even more," he said.

"It's a great way to reconnect all these people who went to Vancouver Talmud Torah and are living in Toronto."

Bogoch is urging any alumni in Toronto who didn't get an invitation to contact him, because he's still trying to find all the 2,000 people who have graduated from the school since 1948. While the VTT was actually founded in 1934, records were only kept after 1948, the year the school moved to its present site at 27th Avenue and Oak Street.

According to its records, VTT had an enrolment of 79 students in 1948. Today, it has 480.

Alumni contact information was inadvertently discarded during the last major expansion in 1995, lamented Bogoch, adding that so far, he has managed to locate 1,500 out of all 2,000 graduates.

The upcoming Toronto brunch is the fifth reunion he's organized since he took on the alumnae portfolio in 2004.

"My father was a really long-time volunteer. He spent years fundraising to keep the school going. He was nicknamed Mr. Talmud Torah," Bogoch said.

"During his shivah – he died in August of 2004 – the president of the [VTT] board asked if I wanted to be on the board. I said. 'Yes.' The board is portfolio-driven. I picked the most fun one. I picked alumni. It's the most perfect thing for me."

Bogoch said he was so eager to reconnect with his graduating class that he held the first reunion for the class of '68 at his home in the summer of 1985.

Out of 23 surviving graduates – four have died – 15 attended, while one was sick and seven were out of town, he recalled.

"We got together and raised $20,000 and put in a spectacular garden at the front of the school."

"These are the people whose kids' bar mitzvahs and weddings you go to… You're still considered part of the gang, whether or not you live in town," he said.

"I still keep in touch with people who live far away. I might not see them for years, but we catch up in two minutes like we've never been apart. When you go through a place like Talmud Torah you keep those friends for life."

In addition to his own graduating year, Bogoch has also organized reunions for the classes of '67, '73, and '76.

"One of the nice things is the feedback that I get. People remember the good times. They look at what they've achieved in life now and they [donate money] to the school, usually in honour of their parents. Sometimes it's in memory of a specific teacher."

The feedback from reunion participants has been very positive, he said. "Everybody says thank you for doing this. Thanks for sending us the newsletter. Thanks for getting us together."

Reaching out to alumni and reconnecting them to the VTT is Bogoch's way of giving back to the school that gave him so much.

"It was a great school. I made all my best friends there," he said.

"It's easy to get passionate about the Talmud Torah. My father was passionate for years and years, and I have picked up the torch."

For more information about the reunion, contact Firestone at 416-880-1764 or sgfassoc@rogers.com, or Bogoch at 604-269-9085 or davidbogoch@yahoo.com

Carleton U offers new Jewish studies minor

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Carleton University is offering a new minor in Jewish studies this fall through its religion program.

"It's a natural fit," said program co-ordinator Leonard Librande, a professor of religion who was instrumental in establishing the minor.

Librande said that in the last 10 years, Carleton has seen the creation of many new minors. Students, especially those in second and third year, find them a good way to "credentialize" their degree, he said.

"It struck me that another area of interest that's always been present in the department as far back as the mid-70s when I started was the area of Jewish studies."

Librande said that while Islam and Buddhism are currently popular religions to study, the department has traditionally had deep ties with the local Jewish and Christian communities.

"One of the things that became apparent was how many people there are at the university, if you ask them to what degree their research and their teaching involves some degree of Judaism, its history or its beliefs, there are an extraordinary number," he said.

The minor requires the completion of four credits. Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, who taught an introduction to Judaism class last year, is expected to teach two classes, a Jewish ethics half-credit in the fall and one about Torah and Talmud in the winter.

Prof. Deidre Butler joined Carleton's faculty last fall and taught a course about sex, love and marriage in Judaism. She is also the religion program's Jewish studies specialist.

"There's a growing excitement about Jewish studies at Carleton," said Butler, noting that about 40 per cent of her class was Jewish, and most felt the opportunity for such studies had been lacking.

"Jewish studies has always been something I'm interested in," said third-year mass communication student Charley Levitan.

Levitan, who took Butler's course, recently enrolled in the minor.

"I was kind of just waiting for it to happen at Carleton. I would always be asking when it was going to materialize," she said.

In terms of the growing opportunities for Jewish studies, Butler also notes the activities of Carleton's Jewish studies centre, which was established in 2005 and renamed the Max and Tessie Zelikovitz Centre for Jewish Studies in 2006 after a $500,000 donation from local philanthropist Max Zelikovitz.

"We seem to be on the cusp of a really exciting moment," said Butler, who is the centre's associate director.

While the centre does not administer any courses or credits, it complements the teaching and research of the religion program, Butler said.

Rabbi Bulka's hiring is an example. The centre is paying for one of his courses, and the religion program for the other, she said.

"We're hoping that the Jewish students will become more involved," said Butler about the centre.

"What I'm hoping is when I'm getting to know students more, it will generate more activism and excitement and we'll grow in a lot of different directions."

Gay rabbi speaks out

By MEREDITH HERMAN
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — The Orthodox Jewish community must be more inclusive of gays and lesbians, says Rabbi Steven Greenberg.

Rabbi Greenberg, the first openly gay Orthodox rabbi, recently spoke at McGill University as part of a panel titled "Gays and God."

Having spent fifteen years coming to terms with his sexual orientation, Rabbi Greenberg, who received his smichah (rabbinic ordination) before he came out as gay, views himself as a spokesperson for homosexuals in the Orthodox world who tries to have people acknowledge the reality of homosexuality.

"At one time, people who were Orthodox and gay were either silent or left," he said. "Not now. Now we're insisting on not being silent."

Certain that the Orthodox position on homosexual relations is unlikely to change soon, Rabbi Greenberg said the greatest obstacle to be overcome is not the halachic text itself, but what is in the hearts and minds of the people.

In his book, Wrestling with God and Men: Homosexuality in the Jewish Tradition, Rabbi Greenberg traces the midrashic and halachic references to homosexuality in an effort to understand how the rabbis conceived of it.

He suggests they believed that God abhors sex that gets confounded with power, violence and humiliation, because, in the ancient world, homosexual acts, specifically anal penetration, were deemed to be the best way for men to humiliate, demean and punish other men.

Rabbi Greenberg challenges the notion that the negative attitude toward same-sex relations stems from religious texts and hypothesizes that the idea was conceived by a homophobic culture that has used the text as a consistent reference point for millennia.

Although Rabbi Greenberg's readings of the midrashim depart from the traditional understanding of the prohibition against male homosexual relations, he admitted that they do little to ameliorate the legal status of homosexual relations in Judaism. Regarding this, he insisted that the Torah cannot prosecute people for things that are not based on choice.

He appealed to a halachic argument made by Rabbi Norman Lamm, the chancellor of Yeshiva University, which states that gays are under duress, and therefore cannot be prosecuted by either humans or God.

As celibacy is not a viable option for most people, Rabbi Greenberg said that a framework within which gays are less than fully culpable can be viewed as a temporary solution until new halachic realities are born.

Asked whether he truly believes that his reading of the text is faithful to rabbinic teaching or if he is merely reading his own biases into the text and looking for a way to legitimize them, Rabbi Greenberg responded, "I get that people want to keep things pure. Part of what I'm after is keeping things human."

Having people leave the community because they are unable to reconcile who they are with the person they are told God wants them to be is not a solution, Rabbi Greenberg said. Rather, he calls for a more nuanced reading of the text that extrapolates previously hidden meaning.

Speaking before the panel discussion, Rabbi Greenberg addressed the same issue.

"I can't imagine that a verse can be made sense of without understanding those who it affects and touches. Until people's stories are heard, no one can claim to know what they mean."

He referred to Trembling Before God, the acclaimed 2001 film that documents the stories of six Orthodox gay Jews.

The film marks a critical first step towards achieving his goal of building an Orthodox community that welcomes its gay congregants with open arms, he said.

On the panel with Rabbi Greenberg were Rev. Ellie Hummel of the United Church of Canada and Father Hor Kutash of the Eastern Orthodox Church. The event was moderated by Marlene Jennings, the Liberal justice critic who pushed for the legalization of gay marriage in Canada.

Toronto Heschel School leads the way in environmental education

by Raquel Kaplan Goldberg

Abraham Joshua Heschel is perhaps best known for his legacy of active social justice – what he called "praying with my feet" – and the Toronto school that bears his name is extending that global consciousness to the environment as the country's first Jewish "EcoSchool."

Building upon an environmental sensitivity that has permeated the Toronto Heschel School since its founding, the school was recently certified by the Ontario EcoSchools program. To be eligible, Heschel had to meet standards in energy conservation, waste minimization, environmental professional development for faculty and staff, and curricular greening initiatives.

"One of the pillars of our school's philosophy is to be environmentally conscious," said Ellen Kessler, Heschel's director of environmental studies and the main force behind the initiative. "We try to promote naturalist intelligence in our students and staff and just to be part of this EcoSchool infrastructure is very exciting."

Heschel was also required to form an "EcoTeam" to plan and evaluate the school's environmental efforts.

With certification comes "tools for developing ecological literacy in the students," Kessler said. "We'll get lesson plans, workshops, and a support system of similarly-minded teachers. By going through this process and becoming certified, we're becoming more organized and focused, and we're being acknowledged for what we've done until now."

The Toronto Heschel School, affiliated with UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education, has long integrated ecological education into its curriculum. One-third of the school's junior kindergarten students stay late on Fridays to participate in a general environmental program. Grade 1 students conduct a recycling audit for the school as part of their "matter, material and miracles" unit. Grade 6 students participate in an "eco-seder that relates the concepts of the Haggada to ecosystems – from the bitter herbs on the seder plate to the [salt] water we pass around," Kessler said, adding that the school has several environmental after-hours and lunch-time clubs.

Jewish values underpin environmental program for schools

by S.I. Stein

A group of 25 educators will travel to Israel this summer as part of a unique professional development program that fuses Jewish values with environmental education.

"From Here Everything Grows" aims to raise awareness of environmental issues among educators through an intensive 10-day program in Israel, in addition to seminars that take place in Toronto both before and after the Israel portion. The Israel segment runs from July 2nd to July 11th.

"We're anchoring our concern about the environment in Jewish values and Jewish teachings," said Ruth Rohn, an educational psychologist with the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education (BJE) and one of the program's coordinators. "This year the environment has really risen onto everyone's awareness and consciousness." Rohn added that this year the BJE drafted a statement on the importance of environmental issues and the program helps carry forward that statement.

The idea for the program came out of discussions that Rohn and colleague Silvia Eilath held with BJE staff, including Israeli emissary Rabbi Natan Kandler, who is responsible for forging and strengthening connections to Israel. The program, now in its second year, is under the aegis of Makom, which is a partnership of the Jewish Agency for Israel and local North American Jewish Federations.

Participants will be spending four days in Eilat-Eilot – UJA Federation's partnership region. "You have kibbutzim in the region that have been very strong advocates for protecting the environment and they're a great role model," said Eilath, a day school consultant with the BJE and another program coordinator. Participants will travel from the south of Israel to the north, with several stops in-between. Highlights include a hike through the Tel Dan nature reserve, meetings with leading Israeli environmental activists and a visit to the underwater observatory in Eilat.

Program participants represent both day and supplementary schools, and there will be a mix of general studies and Judaic studies teachers, in addition to principals and vice-principals.

Rohn said she hopes the program will benefit educators on several levels, including fostering a sense of collegiality and helping teachers recognize Israel as a resource in terms of its response to environmental challenges.

Ultimately, it is the students who will benefit from their teachers' enhanced knowledge and awareness. "The bottom line is that kids will benefit from teachers who have better knowledge, better skills and better preparedness to teach these issues," said Rohn.

UJA Federation/York U. special education course provides teachers with new skills

by Carla Lancit

Twenty teachers from Jewish schools in Toronto recently completed an important course on special education run by the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education in conjunction with York University.

The teachers represented schools from across the spectrum of Jewish learning, including United Synagogue Day School, the Toronto Heschel School, Ahavat Yisrael Hebrew School, and Yeshiva Yesodei Hatorah. The teachers had previously completed two terms of education that helped equip them with strategies to address the needs of all students in the classroom.

The third section of the course emphasized leadership within special education — both within the classroom and on the community level. Each teacher completed a project called Teacher Inquiry, in which they identified a question of concern, researched it, built an action plan, applied it and evaluated it.

"These teachers are going back to the classroom and they're not just infused with knowledge but they have learned how to execute that knowledge," said Dafna Ross, senior special education consultant at the BJE. "The children benefit because they are receiving their Jewish content and learning skills via a much more holistic education that views the child as a whole."

One teacher from TanenbaumCHAT said the course had an impact on her. "It affected me – I'm using all kinds of skills that I learned," said Yael Amar, who has taught at TanenbaumCHAT's north campus for six years and serves as the department head of Hebrew and Modern Languages. Despite her experience, Amar said she felt she was lacking some skills. "I was looking at my class, seeing some special needs, some different needs, and I was asking myself how I can make learning happen," she said. "I thought this would be the right course for me."

After completing all three sections, Amar said she can hardly remember what teaching was like before, adding that her priorities in the classroom have shifted. "It's not that we were not concerned before, but teachers are very worried about covering the curriculum. I'm still worried about that, but my priorities have changed — first to make learning happen, not just to cover the curriculum, but to give them some tools and skills to learn independently."

Ross said the course imparts invaluable lessons. "This course recognizes two important things to the community: that Jewish education is very important, and that every Jewish child deserves to have a Jewish education," she said. "It's not about how smart or talented the child is, it's how do we as teachers come up with a way to reach the needs of every child."

Oakville supplementary school links children to Judaism

by A.M. Segal

She lives on a street without Jewish neighbours and doesn't count Jews among her daytime classmates, but every week, four-year-old Emma Hyett is chomping at the bit to go to Hebrew school.

"Emma loves it," says her mother, Bonnie Hyett.

"She asks me every week, 'Mommy, how many more days till Hebrew school?'"

The Hyett family lives in Oakville, a predominantly non-Jewish community west of Toronto that is home to Beit Sefer Shaarei-Beth El, a supplementary religious school with about 60 students.

The school runs classes twice a week, is affiliated with UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education and offers a comprehensive curriculum that includes Hebrew, prayer, Bible study and the teaching of Jewish customs, values and the holidays. Many of the teachers are experienced instructors who come in from Toronto.

Though small in size, the school boasts a committed core group of students and their respective families. Ran Salamon, the school's director of education, attributes this to the community's strong resolve to keep the faith and the school's outreach efforts.

"The great thing about this community is that everybody makes a conscientious effort to pull together and link with Judaism," says Salamon. "It's a small community, but everybody knows each other and is engaged. It's a nice feeling."

Salamon adds that both the school and Shaarei-Beth El Congregation, which has 135 family members, offer a variety of informal programs to connect with the community, such as a mom and tots program, a youth group, town halls and dances.

"For us to establish strong bonds amongst the kids and the families in the community, we provide heavy after-school programming, whether it be trips to the Jewish Film Festival or going on the UJA Federation Walk with Israel," Salamon says.

Hyett believes the school's small size provides a more 'intimate' form of education than what students may receive in a larger setting.

"Because the class sizes are small, they are more intimate," says Hyett, who is chair of the school's education committee.

"Emma has only nine kids in her class and she's made close friends because of that and has a positive experience."

Still, Salamon points out that enrolment is not rising and in order for the school and the community to flourish in the future, connections with Toronto's Jewish community and other established Jewish institutions are imperative.

"Making connections with other Jewish institutions really strengthens everyone," says Salamon.

"For example, we are in discussions with TanenbaumCHAT about the possibility of having a commuter bus that will bring students from Oakville to TanenbaumCHAT's north campus. That would be a huge development to have a Jewish day school option, something you wouldn't be able to do in Oakville."

The next big thing on the horizon for Jewish residents of Oakville is the arrival of Rabbi Stephen Weiss, an American rabbi who is slated to start at Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in June.

Three Thornhill day schools unite to celebrate Israel Independence Day

by Raquel Kaplan Goldberg

Walking past three Jewish day schools within 100 yards of each other in Thornhill, one is reminded of the classic aphorism, "two Jews, three opinions." But on April 24, Netivot HaTorah, Leo Baeck Day School, and Associated Hebrew Schools – affiliated with Orthodox, Reform and traditional Judaism, respectively – came together to celebrate Yom Ha'atzmaut, Israel Independence Day.

Over 700 students from grades three, four and five gathered at Netivot HaTorah, where they departed for a mini-parade that traveled north on Atkinson Avenue, past Leo Baeck, and ended at Associated. Along the way marchers were cheered on by parents, other students, and neighbourhood residents "leaning out of their windows waving flags," according to David Prashker, director of education at Leo Baeck. Municipal support closed the street to traffic and provided a police presence.

A joint assembly followed, at which the Associated choir and rikudiyah (dance club) performed. Netivot HaTorah junior high school girls entertained with a daglanut (a choreographed movement involving flags) while their male peers put on a percussion show à la "Stomp," and Leo Baeck students treated the crowd to an Israeli dance routine. There was Hatikvah, a prayer on behalf of Israel's kidnapped soldiers, and speeches, including remarks made by Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation's Senior Vice President for Jewish Education and Identity, and Jewish Agency representative Natan Kandler, who presented greetings via DVD from Eilat, Toronto's Partnership sister city.

The celebration was the brainchild of Prashker and Elliott Diamond, vice principal of Judaic studies at Netivot HaTorah, who were inspired to find ways "that we can work together effectively to support the Jewish community and to build the Jewish community," according to Prashker. "We want to be a community of Jewish day schools."

After successfully piloting a smaller march last year, the three schools decided to expand the festivities for 2007, inviting parents to line the route and increasing student participation both in the parade and the assembly.

According to Epstein, the parade "reflected the two most important issues in Jewish life today: unity and the future. The fact that three schools with divergent ideologies came together is a sign of hope for unity, and the fact that these children are being trained in schools which care about both Jewish literacy and deep Jewish identity is the best indication for the future."

Yom Ha'atzmaut provides the perfect opportunity for cooperation, said Linda Kichler, vice principal at Associated. "We can all celebrate the birthday of Israel, it unites us all. Here we are with different philosophies, but on this day we were one."

Diamond agreed, pleased that the holiday could "bring the schools together about something that was important to all of us," he said. "It makes us stronger as a community when we discover and stress the commonalities that bind us."

Nova Scotia professor blasts critics

Dossa attended Holocaust-denial conference in Tehran

A tenured political science professor at St. Francis Xavier University who attended a Holocaust-denial conference in Tehran has accused his school of "illiteracy and bias" and of authorizing "a small Spanish Inquisition… launched by two Jewish professors and the Christian chair of the political science department."

Shiraz Dossa, who teaches political theory and comparative politics at the Nova Scotia institution, made the accusations in an article in the June 2007 edition of the Literary Review of Canada, in which he defended his participation in the conference.

Dossa, the only Canadian to attend the December 2006 event, stated that "St. Francis Xavier in effect sanctioned a crusade against a Muslim Holocaust scholar, who also happens to be an outspoken critic of Israel's brutality in occupied Palestine."

Dossa wrote that he has never denied the Holocaust, "only noted its propaganda power."

He also denounced the university for not defending his academic freedom.

Dossa was roundly criticized when he attended the conference, which was seen as another effort by the government of Iran to attack Jews and Israel. Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly questioned the veracity of the Holocaust while calling for the destruction of the State of Israel.

Ahmadinejad repeated some of those threats in an address to the conference, which was also attended by former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, who presented a paper that said gas chambers that killed Jews never existed.

The event was sponsored by the Iranian Institute of Political and International Studies, a department of the Iranian ministry of foreign affairs. It was chaired by a deputy foreign minister.

At the time, university president Sean Riley said Dossa's attendance at the Tehran conference caused "shock and anger" at the university.

Riley defended that criticism last week, asserting that while Dossa is entitled to his opinion, it was "terrible" that the school's name was "tainted" by the participation in the conference of "those denying one of the great tragedies of human rights in the modern era."

In his June article, Dossa said Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has never called the Holocaust a myth and never threatened to destroy Israel. "As an Iran specialist, I can attest that both accusations are false," he wrote, saying that Ahmadinejad's comments had been improperly translated.

Dossa goes on to call the conference an academic exercise "convened to devise an intellectual/political response to western-Israeli intervention in Muslim affairs." He rejected suggestions the conference focused on Holocaust denial – though he acknowledged "the presence of a few notorious western Christian deniers/skeptics, a couple of a neo-Nazi stripe."

He also tore into the Globe and Mail for an editorial that was critical of his attendance, and he included a personal attack on commentators John Ibbitson and Rex Murphy, who questioned his participation.

Responding to Dossa in a May 30 letter to the Globe, Abraham Foxman, national director of the Anti-Defamation League, wrote that he "shamelessly tries to justify his attendance at last year's Holocaust-denial conference in Iran by whitewashing both the proceedings and the Iranian president's history of Holocaust denial and anti-Semitism.

"There is no doubt that the conference was specifically convened to promote the view that the Holocaust is a hoax that Jews invented and imposed on the entire world.

"To our knowledge, Prof. Dossa was the only scholar from a mainstream Western university to attend. No doubt the organizers were delighted by the prestige his institutional affiliation lent the proceedings."

In another May 30 letter to the Globe, University of Toronto law professor and Canadian Jewish Congress president Ed Morgan, writing in his capacity as an academic, noted that "academic freedom and freedom of expression do not render any of us immune from being criticized."

The letter, which was co-signed by York University history professor (and former CJC president) Irving Abella and 11 other scholars, said Dossa had a right to attend the conference, "but we would hope academics of good conscience would condemn it."

Two outlooks on famous landmark cases that have shaped our society.

Join Join Arthur Stern, renowned Toronto criminal lawyer, and popular Aish Rabbis, Dan Rand and Dovid Zauderer, who will present the secular and Torah perspectives on 3 contentious and controversial legal cases.

The Miranda Warning - Wednesday, June 13
One of the most famous legal terms is the Miranda warning. It is taken as a fundamental requirement to safeguarding the rights of all citizens. This session will describe the precedent setting case that established this law and explore it's beneficial and injurious impact. The Torah's unique take will bring new clarity to our understanding on the concept of warning suspects.

The Rodriguez Case - Wednesday, June 20
There is probably no greater emotional legal situation than the controversy over Euthanasia, also known as assisted suicide. The case of Sue Rodriguiz captured the imagination of Canada as this young woman appealed to the Supreme Court to be allowed a physician assisted suicide. Our experts in Canadian law and Torah ethics will challenge us to examine our own perspective on the legal and moral implications of "mercy killing."

The Zundel Case - Wednesday, June 27
Fundamental to a free society is free speech. At the same time the simple example of yelling "fire" in a crowded building is recognized as being untenable. To have clarity is to see both sides of an issue. This session will "defend" and "prosecute" the man who galvanized the nation about this issue. The Torah and Talmud viewpoints will focus and deepen our understanding.

CBC Radio's Iran segment was off the point

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

On May 23, Carol Off, host of CBC Radio's As It Happens, introduced a segment on Iran's nuclear program with the following statement: "A report issued today by the International Atomic Energy agency (IAEA) does not mince words. Iran has not scrapped its nuclear program. Rather, the program continues to expand."

To explore the subject, Off interviewed Henry Sokolski, director of the Washington-based Non-Proliferation Policy Education Center. She began by asking his opinion of the IAEA report. Sokolski complained that until now, the agency has been in denial about Iran's determination to produce nuclear weapons. "[W]e don't want to admit that Iran is trying to make a bomb. We don't want to admit that it can," he said.

Instead of following through on the key question of how the international community might contain the Iranian threat, Off turned the discussion in a radically different direction – toward Israel and the possibility that Iran is, after all, only acting to defend itself against Israel's nuclear weapons!

When Sokolski failed to agree with this idea, Off pressed further: "But if it's wrong for [Iran] to have [nuclear weapons], if it's wrong for anyone to have [them], then why do we continue to not challenge Israel for its program?" She then suggested that Iran might also be acting defensively against the United States, which branded it "part of an axis of evil."

Sokolski tried to draw the discussion back to Iran itself: "You know, if you talk to Iran's neighbours, they see [Iran's] weapons not as a reply to Israel, they see them as a way of pressuring events nearby and influencing how the neighbourhood will be run in the Persian Gulf. So it's a little more complicated, is all I'm saying."

Off was apparently not satisfied with Sokolski's answer and persevered with her Iran-as-potential-victim line. "If Iran feels it must have these [nuclear weapons] because it's afraid for whatever reason."

At this point Sokolski interjected and told Off he was "rebutting" her thesis. Her idea, he believed, was "not a very good explanation for why [Iran] is engaged in its nuclear program."

Not only was Off's argument weak, Sokolski said, more importantly, it was not even endorsed by some of Iran's own leaders.

He pointed out that contrary to Off's theory, these Iranian officials don't express fear of the United States or Israel. Rather, they say, "'Why shouldn't we have these?'"

Sokolski tried to convince Off that "in other words, I don't think fear [of Israel and the United States] is necessarily the key explanation or even the prime one."

Only at this point, late in the interview, did Off stop pushing the idea that Iran might be acting in self-defence against Israel.

This left precious little time to return to where the interview began – how the international community can handle Iran's nuclear program and its defiance of the UN Security Council.

Anyone listening closely to Off but not Sokolski might have concluded that the answer lies in confronting Israel and the United States – but not Iran!

In the few seconds Sokolski had left, he finally made his point: Iran must be treated the way the West previously confronted the former Soviet Union.

The West must "wipe this current hostile regime out" with a combination of diplomacy and military capability, mainly through the buildup of NATO forces in the Persian Gulf, Sokolski said.

In short, there must be a concerted determination to rein in Iran's aggressive intent and ultimately bring about a regime change.

Student council president gets award

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Yael Shrom says it was quite a surprise to receive a Provincial Excellence Award from the Canada Millennium Scholarship Foundation.

The dynamic Gray Academy student council president knew she was being considered for the $16,000 award, but she said that when she called in late April to inquire about it, she was led to believe that she wasn't going to get the scholarship.

"I was both excited and shocked when I got the letter with the notification," she said.

The Canada Millennium Scholarship Foundation is an independent organization that was created by an act of Parliament in 1998. It encourages Canadian students to pursue post-secondary studies and distributes $325 million in bursaries and scholarships each year throughout Canada.

Shrom – who was recognized for her academic achievements, her volunteer efforts in the larger community, her leadership and her commitment to innovation – was one of more than 240 provincial and territorial excellence award laureates selected this year across Canada.

Shrom's scholarship pays $16,000 over four years to help fund her post-secondary education.

"It was quite the ride," Shrom said of her just-completed studies at Winnipeg's Jewish high school.

In Grade 9, she was head of student council's fundraising committee, and she was its secretary the next year. In Grade 11, she was vice-president.

As student council president this past year, her goals were to help connect the student body and the administration, and to continue to raise funds for causes such as CancerCare Manitoba, Shalom Residences (primarily for Jewish developmentally challenged adults), Magen David Adom and others.

She also wanted to make student council a force in each student's life with spirited pep rallies, celebrations of Jewish holidays and random fun days.

Shrom's leadership and determination to make a difference were evident in her student-driven Loonie Toonie province-wide fundraiser for cancer, for which she solicited the participation of several other schools in the city and surrounding area.

The foundation's selection committee was also impressed that a Gray Academy student petition to free three kidnapped Israeli soldiers (part of a Raoul Wallenberg Day commemoration) reached Prime Minister Stephen Harper.

"What I loved about Gray Academy is that because there is a smaller atmosphere, I was able to take advantage of all of these opportunities, whereas at other schools, I would not be able to," Shrom said.

"How many people at a large high school can say that, simultaneously, they were involved in student council; played on the volleyball, basketball and soccer teams; went on educational trips to Israel, the UN, and the March of the Living; became a journalist for the school newspaper and a peer tutor; and also performed in the school band?

"At Gray Academy, the smaller, more nurturing atmosphere, allows for every student to excel in the activity and program that he or she chooses."

Within Winnipeg's Jewish and general communities, Shrom has been active in human rights and quality-of-life organizations. She has held chair and co-ordinator positions and raised medical funds and social programming funds through CancerCare Manitoba, The United Way, Jewish Child & Family Service, and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg.

Last year, Shrom was the recipient of the Special Contribution to School Life award. At convocation this year, she received the Gray Academy of Jewish Education Gold Medal for combining high academic achievement in Grade 11 and Grade 12 with participation in extra-curricular activities and overall contribution to the school.

"Yael is a leader in her community and a future leader in the community at large," said Gray Academy's head of school, Rory Paul.

Shrom is currently in Israel with most of her graduating classmates.

(The Gray Academy senior class traditionally goes to Israel for four weeks immediately after graduation. Most students take part in the program.)

In September, Shrom will start a bachelor of science degree at the University of Manitoba. She hopes to become a doctor.

She said she is also looking forward to continuing her volunteer work and leadership roles.

Reform convert takes the plunge in Newfoundland

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It takes a lot of nerve to jump into the frigid northern Atlantic waters off Newfoundland on any May 8.

Indeed, it took a major commitment – to himself and to his conversion to Judaism – for John Longlott to take that icy plunge, three times, as he became the first person to undergo conversion to Judaism in Newfoundland.

"I was moved," Longlott said of the moment he completed the immersion ritual in the Reform conversion.

Longlott was born in the United States but is a dual citizen, because his mother is a Toronto native. Longlott's commitment was completed when he dipped into the waves at Middle Cove Beach, near St. John's, before several dozen witnesses, including his sister, Laurie Karitsis of Pennsylvania.

His large group of friends, including some from Newfoundland's Jewish community, heard Longlott speak passionately and eloquently about his intentions and reasons for converting to Judaism.

John Longlott

The 41-year-old former resident of Wernersville, Pa., (near Reading) studied and read about his newly chosen religion for several years. To complete the conversion, he took written and oral examinations, and, lastly, the final step into the ocean.

"It was a very powerful experience for me. I felt I had been doing many things Jewish in spirit for the past few years, but needed this conversion to complete my soul," said the music composer, who moved to Newfoundland three years ago.

"I felt it wasn't necessary to formalize my conversion to make a connection to God, but it was important for me to be part of the Jewish community."

Longlott left the United States in early 2003, unhappy with the political situation there and with a desire to change his life. He had met a Newfoundlander in 2001, before the events of 9/11, with no idea where the easternmost province was.

"I researched it, discovered Newfoundland was a beautiful place with hard-working, humble people – plus I had an attachment to the ocean," he said.

His introduction to Judaism had come a few years earlier when he worked at a drug rehabilitation centre in Pennsylvania. As part of the rehabilitation of one of his clients, he attended services with her at her synagogue.

"I went to a bar mitzvah and was impressed with the message of peace and working with others that the young man uttered," Longlott said.

"That started my investigation into Judaism. I took a course on the history of the Holocaust at a Penn State branch. I discussed Judaism with Rabbi Brian I. Michaelson of Temple Oheb Shalom in Wyomissing [Pa., about 10 minutes from Reading], and the seed was planted."

The rabbi invited Longlott to attend weekly Friday evening services at the Reform temple and that, plus reading assigned books and doing other research, went on for about two years.

When Longlott finally decided to leave the United States in 2003, his depth of commitment was complete.

In Newfoundland, he met Reb Sherrill Gilbert, a Reconstructionist rabbinic student who was working in collaboration with rabbis Elina Bykova and Leigh Lerner of Temple Emanu-el Beth Sholom in Montreal.

He is now part of a small group of Jews, not connected with the synagogue in St. John's, who gather for davening on Friday nights and holidays. There are currently two more students engaged in studies for local conversion to Judaism.

Bat mitzvah donates over $20,000 to Sunnybrook

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

With all of the gifts, glitz and glamour of contemporary bar/bat mitzvahs, it's all too easy for the mitzvah aspect of the event to simply be a footnote.

But in the Blankenstein family, mitzvah has most certainly been the magic word when it comes to bar/bat mitzvah celebrations.

Dani Blankenstein, a 12-year-old student at Bialik Hebrew Day School, recently donated more than $20,000 from her bat mitzvah proceeds to an endowment fund in her grandmother's name for hematology and oncology research at Sunnybrook Regional Cancer Centre.

Dani and Adam Blankenstein

Cancer has touched the lives of the Blankenstein family and that was at the forefront of Dani's desire to make the substantial donation.

"I wanted…my bubby to be part of my bat mitzvah," she relates.

"I don't want anyone else to get leukemia or lymphoma and I don't want anyone else to miss having a family member at their bat mitzvah."

Dani's brother Adam, a 15-year-old CHAT student, also parlayed his philanthropic instincts during his bar mitzvah year by requesting his guests support the breast cancer research group at Sunnybrook.

The more than $20,000 donated to The Adam Blankenstein Fund will support construction of a patient resource area at Sunnybrook's new breast cancer centre, slated to open in 2009.

"I am fortunate that I was able to use my bar mitzvah gifts to donate to an important cause," says Adam, noting he helped decide where the proceeds would be directed and had a lot of input in the entire process.

"This was a cause close to my family with personal meaning to me."

Adam and Dani's parents, Dr. Harvey Blankenstein and Dr. Fay Sliwin, both note that the personal connection is definitely a motivator .

"It's a matter of doing something that's close to your child's heart," says Sliwin.

"If the kids see the importance of it, they'll want to do it on their own, which is exactly what happened with us."

Philanthropy is a cornerstone in the Sliwin and Blankenstein families, going back several generations.

Harvey Blankenstein says kids learn by example when it comes to charity and that it's never too early to start nurturing such values in children.

"Realizing there are others who are less fortunate than they are is something they've learned since childhood," the father says.

"Even when Adam and Dani were little kids, for their birthday gifts, they would ask for donations to things like the school library."

As medical professionals who have dealt with cancer both personally and professionally, Blankenstein and Sliwin are especially proud of what their kids have done.

"We know the tangible benefits…of how [the donations] are really going to impact people," he says.

"And I think it's important for the kids to understand the value of what they're doing. It really makes them feel good to give back to the community."

Magnetic ribbons help support programs in Israel

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

A blue, orange and white magnetic ribbon is now available to raise both awareness of Israel and funds to help Israeli victims of terror and violence.

Atarah Derrick, speaking for the Toronto Zionist Council, which launched the initiative, said the magnets can be found in 20 locations across the city, particularly along the Bathurst Street corridor. They cost $5.

SUPPORT
ISRAEL

Among other charities, the money will go to NATAL, the Israel Trauma Center for Victims of Terror and War; Lev U'Neshama, which supplies clothing and food to the needy in Safed; Operation Dignity, helping the evacuees from Neve Dekalim, which was an Israeli settlement in the Gaza strip; the Israel Free Loan Association that provides scholarship grants, free loans and small business free loans; and JobKatif, offering employment opportunities for former residents of the Gaza Strip.

Toronto Zionist Council vice-president Izzy Kaplan, whose idea the magnets were, said that Israel is "on my mind 24 hours a day. I am always trying to find ways to bring Diaspora Jews closer to the issues [affecting the country.]"

Noting wryly that in a big city, "you are always behind someone in a traffic jam," Kaplan said he was always seeing different emblems on the backs of cars in support of any number of causes, from breast cancer to political issues. "I figured that everyone notices what's there."

On a different level, he said, "anti-Semitism and Jew/Israel bashing have become almost common. People may have difficulty in dealing with this."

He believes that seeing the new magnets gives people a shot in the arm and an inner strength.

He chose the colours – bright orange, blue and white – first, because of their vividness, and second, for their symbolism. Blue and white are the colours of the Israeli flag, and orange is used for issues in Gaza, Iran and Lebanon – the primary issues Israel is facing today.

Black letters on the ribbons say: "Fight terrorism!" and "Support Israel."

Kaplan developed a display unit and contacted various shops. The response so far, he said, has been very favourable.

The GTA, he said, is the test market for the project. If it goes well, he will try to expand it to places like New York and Los Angeles. "It just takes volunteers, people willing to work on it."

He is even exploring the idea of translating the message into Hebrew, and selling the ribbons in Israel.

Winnipeg CJA names campaign chair

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Jewish Federation of Winnipeg has tapped Ben Cohen, the President of Oreck Canada and one of Canada's leading younger businessmen to chair this year's CJA campaign.

The 43-year-old Cohen has shown himself to be a savvy marketer as well as an individual who is committed to his community.

Last year's campaign raised a record $5.1 million, slightly higher than the targeted goal of $5 million. In addition, the community raised $2.3 million in emergency funding for Israel as a result of the damage caused by the Lebanon War.

"People in Winnipeg are very generous," he says. "We have a good broad-based campaign that gives a large amount per capita. The women's campaign is equally successful."

Cohen praised the federation for doing a good job of grooming younger members of the community to take on leadership roles.

Cohen and his wife, Simone (who teaches kindergarten at the Grey Academy) have three children, Jacqueline, 8, Harry, 7 and Myles, 5.

She is the sister of CJA executive director Elaine Goldstine and sister-in-law of Dr. Ian Goldstine (Elaine's husband) who chaired the overall campaign last year.

Allentuck shares her sister and brother-in-law's strong commitment to the community and the work of the Jewish Federation. A federal government employee, Allentuck has been involved in the Women's Division campaign for many years.

Last year, she reports, the Women's Division campaign raised $1,086,000. The goal this year is $1.1 million. The goal for the overall campaign is still to be determined.

Recipes, wisdom and humour for a healthy lifestyle

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Edith Rothschild's new book Nutrilicious, Food for Thought and Whole Health (Feldheim Publishers) is much more than a cookbook.

"It's the story of how I turned my life around and committed myself to a healthy lifestyle," she says.

A mother, grandmother and great-grandmother, Rothschild, who has a counselling psychology degree from the Adler Professional School of Psychology, suffered for years with osteoarthritis.

"I had debilitating back pain and joint inflammation, and for 25 years, I spent hours a day in bed," she said in an interview at her home office.

"Consultations with doctors left me with an assortment of medical opinions, and I was started on a number of medications, none of which were good for my stomach."

Eventually she decided to take charge of her own health, and in the late 1970s, turned to "God's natural drugstore to allow the healing powers He built into me to take over."

Her explorations led her to a holistic, vegetarian lifestyle, she said, and through "trial and error I learned over the course of many years which foods, diets, remedies, healing techniques, therapies and modalities would be good for me and which ones I should avoid."

The lifestyle was not totally new to her, she said, because her mother, Joanne Hertz, "instilled in me at a very young age the love of nature and all things green. She fed us muesli made with raw oat flakes, ground hazelnut, shredded coconut, anise seeds, raisins and pure sugar from grapes."

Rothschild said when she began writing the book – she worked on it for almost nine years – she had no intention of preaching. "I simply wanted to share my life story."

The "non-glossy" book is easy to read, and chock-full of information suitable for anyone interested in a vegetarian diet. It is also full of personal stories and rhymes.

To keep it light-hearted, she starts off with a poem: "Come listen to my story/ And listen to it well/ About the book you're holding/ It is I want to tell/ Too bad you had to wait so long/ It seemed like endless years/ Of slave labour in my kitchen/ With testing, tasting and tears/ It's all about good cooking/ But in it you'll find much more/ With bits 'n bites 'n tidbits/ and sayings and stories galore."

She lists ingredients she always has on hand in her own kitchen, such as Bragg liquid soy, Rice Dream non-dairy frozen dessert, and Nasoya, a soya-based sandwich spread. The comprehensive list includes dried fruits, legumes, nuts and seeds, dried sea vegetables, pastas, vinegars and oils.

She admits that maintaining a healthy lifestyle is a commitment. "But, what is my alternative?"

Her healthy regimen includes a twice daily break for jin shin jytusu, a physio-philosophy that facilitates balance in the body's energy systems and promotes health and well being.

She is not free of cravings, she said, and still enjoys a bagel, lox and cream cheese, "but only once in a while. If I listen to my body, I'm fine."

BEYOND THE RAINBOW SALAD

No veggies, raw or cooked, are safe from my passion for this vita-packed, mix 'n match salad. It is especially good for those poor souls who don't like vegetables but need their immune-building properties.

4 cups shredded packed romaine lettuce
1/4 cup shredded packed radicchio
1/4 cup shredded packed Belgian endive
1/3 cup finely sliced purple onion
2-in. piece English cucumber, shaved with a vegetable peeler
1 small carrot, shaved with a vegetable peeler
1 celery stalk, shaved with a vegetable peeler
1/8 cup finely chopped dill
2-3 tbsp. flaxseed oil
3 tbsp. brown rice vinegar or 1-2 tbsp. apple cider vinegar
2 tbsp. umeboshi vinegar
1 tbsp. dried marjoram

In a large bowl, place all the vegetables and dill and toss well.

Pour the oil and vinegars and marjoram over the salad, toss well, adjust seasoning and serve immediately. Serves 5-6.

For best results, the greens in this salad should be fresh, crisp, and completely dry.

Variations:

More colour in your salad means more energy for you and adds to your daily vitamin and mineral account. Add to this salad any of the following, according to your taste: finely sliced raw mushrooms, finely grated raw or cooked beets, yellow or red sweet peppers, cut into fine strips. You can also sneak in some steamed kale or broccoli. Served with some kind of grains, pasta or wholesome bread, this salad can become a main course.

British union keeps boycott talk alive

JTA Staff

LONDON — The decision by Britain's largest academic union to further consider a boycott of Israeli academics drew swift and harsh reaction from Israel's supporters.

"Essentially, British trade unions are declaring war on Israel," Ronnie Fraser, director of the Academic Friends of Israel, told JTA.

Last week, the University and College Union stopped short of calling for an all-out boycott, but instead passed a motion to circulate Palestinian calls for an academic boycott of Israel to its branches "for information and discussion."

The motion, at the group's first gathering, passed by a vote of 158 to 99.

In a statement, the union said the boycott motion means branches "have a responsibility" to consult all of their members on the issue. The union represents 120,000 workers in higher education throughout the United Kingdom.

The motion passed despite comments during the debate by the union's new general secretary, Sally Hunt, who said, "I do not believe a boycott is supported by the majority of UCU members, nor do I believe that members see it is a priority for the union."

Ed Morgan, president of the Canadian Jewish Congress, told The CJN that "CJC completely opposes the boycott. We feel that it's misguided. It not only stifles academic freedom and freedom of speech but it [also] wrongly targets Israeli academics and Israeli institutions for issues that have nothing to do with them and are beyond their control.

"Israel has one of the most vibrant and high-quality academic scenes anywhere, and it only exacerbates conflict with the Palestinians to target the [Israeli] academic world.

"The CJC and CIC [Canada-Israel Committee] are sister organizations working together on this. We're helping disseminate their call to action," Morgan said.

Last week, the CIC answered a British Jewish Union request for worldwide Jewry to exert pressure on the UCU by issuing an "urgent call to action" via e-mail to members of the Canadian Jewish community.

The e-mail contained a template letter addressed to Hunt, citing deep disappointment in the UCU and exhorting Hunt to "act upon your electoral promise that under your watch as general secretary, any boycott resolution would have to be approved in a national referendum by all of UCU's members, and to issue a clear and categorical statement to this effect." The CIC asked recipients to circulate the letter to their contacts.

The UCU's move to consider a boycott of Israeli academics is the latest of several British efforts to boycott Israel. Last month the National Union of Journalists passed a motion to boycott Israeli goods. More recently, a group of British doctors and a group of architects called for a boycott within their respective professions.

The UCU also passed a motion to campaign for the restoration of all international aid to the Palestinian Authority and all revenues that the union says rightfully belong to the authority. Worldwide aid to the Palestinian Authority was stopped when Hamas took control of the government last year.

Boycott opponents were outraged by the union's vote.

Ofir Frankel, executive director of the International Advisory Board for Academic Freedom based at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, said the union "has allowed itself to act as a one-sided player in Middle Eastern politics. It is very disturbing to behold a form of singling out and discrimination happening in the U.K. – the U.K. which upholds itself as the cradle of fairness, freedom of speech and academic debate."

Jeremy Newmark, chief executive of the Jewish Leadership Council, said that while the vast majority of academics do not support a boycott, "this decision damages the credibility of British academia as a whole."

In a statement, the Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish Organizations said, "These obscene resolutions have all the faults that academics normally deplore in their profession: a superficial and flawed understanding of the subject, clear bias, and antagonism to the open exchange of ideas."

British and Israeli government officials also registered their opposition to the move. Britain's minister of state for education, Bill Rammell, denounced last week's vote, saying it would do nothing to promote Israeli-Palestinian peace efforts.

"The U.K. government fully supports academic freedom and is firmly against any academic boycotts of Israel or Israeli academics," Rammell said.

In Israel, cabinet minister Isaac Herzog, whose portfolio includes monitoring anti-Semitism abroad, conveyed the [Prime Minister Ehud] Olmert government's anger at the resolution to British Ambassador Tom Phillips.

"It is especially troubling that this resolution was passed in a country that is considered friendly to Israel," Herzog told Israel Radio. "It requires a soul-searching on the part of all British citizens."

Entebbe conspiracy report roils Israelis

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israelis are outraged over a 30-year-old British conspiracy theory about the origins of the legendary Entebbe operation. Experts on the Entebbe rescue, including Benjamin Netanyahu, are weighing in to debunk the theory.

A BBC report published June 1 quoted a recently declassified British government memorandum suggesting that Jerusalem secretly collaborated with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP) terrorists who hijacked an Air France airliner full of Israeli passengers on June 27, 1976.

The plane was redirected to the Entebbe Airport in Uganda, where the hijackers demanded that Israel release Palestinian prisoners en masse. Israel refused, and ultimately dispatched commandos for a rescue mission 2,400 miles away that astonished the world.

But according to a theory advanced by D.H. Colvin, a British diplomat in Paris at the time of the crisis, the hijacking may have been staged as part of a bid by Israel to discredit the Palestinians in the West.

In a memorandum uncovered by the BBC, Colvin quoted an unnamed source as saying that the "the hijack was the work of the PFLP, with help from the Israeli Secret Service, the Shin Bet.

"The operation was designed to torpedo the PLO's standing in France and to prevent what they see as a growing rapprochement between the PLO and the Americans," Colvin wrote of the Israelis.

The emergence of the memorandum made the front page of Israel's Ma'ariv newspaper and drew incredulous responses from Entebbe veterans.

"It is simply implausible that someone in Israel collaborated with this hijacking, even partially or tangentially," retired general Yehoshua Shani, who commanded the airlift to and from Uganda, told the newspaper. "This theory is just absurd."

Israeli opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, whose brother Yoni was killed while leading the commando unit in Entebbe, described the BBC report as part of a longstanding tradition of anti-Zionist and anti-Semitic slurs.

"This is an absolute lie, an evil lie," he told Israel's Army Radio. "It reminds me of those who, after the attack on the Twin Towers by Arab terrorists, said it was organized by the American CIA and the Israeli Mossad."

The BBC report did not indicate how Colvin's memorandum was received in London at the time. Some Israeli experts suggested that Colvin was simply doing his duty by discreetly relaying an intelligence tidbit to his superiors.

France, Spain condemn Ahmadinejad's remarks on Israel

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — France and Spain on Monday issued condemnations of the Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad's latest verbal attack on Israel, in which he said that the world would soon witness the destruction of Israel.

Spanish Foreign Minister Miguel Angel Moratinos called Ahmadinejad's comments unacceptable.

"These words need a strong response," he told Spanish national radio. Moratinos will summon Iran's ambassador in the coming days, a Foreign Ministry spokesperson said.

In France, Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner said the president's comments were "unacceptable" and "incompatible" with Tehran's wish to play a major role in the region.

"If these comments were actually made, they are unacceptable. I condemn them with utmost severity," Kouchner said in a statement.

"Such statements are incompatible with the dialogue between cultures and civilizations to which we are attached and with Iran's aspiration to play a role of major importance in the region."

Ahmadinejad said Sunday last summer's war between Israel and Hezbollah showed for the first time that the hegemony of the occupier regime [Israel] had collapsed, and the Lebanese nation pushed the button to begin counting the days until the destruction of the Zionist regime, Islamic Republic News Agency quoted him as saying.

Israel responded Sunday by asking the international community for a condemnation of Ahmadinejad's comments.

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said on Monday that Iran will not beg world powers for its right to develop nuclear technology and has shown it will not retreat from the "field of danger" to protect such rights.

The defiant remarks by the Islamic Republic's highest authority come two days ahead of a summit of the Group of Eight top industrialized nations that is expected to include discussions about the row over Iran's nuclear program.

World powers have demanded Iran halt uranium enrichment, a process western nations say Tehran is mastering so it can build atomic bombs. Tehran insists its plans have purely civilian goals and has refused to halt the work.

'Tension is high'

part of the Afikim (Wellsprings) Jewish outreach project, life was quiet. No one could have dreamed the community would be on the front lines of Palestinian terror bombings. Jerusalem, Tel Aviv, those were the more typical high-profile targets for terrorists, she said. But Sderot?

Life has changed dramatically for the town's 24,000 residents. Even the simplest task has taken on added danger. Orenbuch's oldest daughter won't shower unless mommy is nearby with a bathrobe waiting to take her to the safe room in case the warning sirens sound. Getting her brood – they range in age from 14 to one – ready for school is a logistical undertaking of monumental proportions. Everyone must be ready at the door to leave at exactly the same time, and everything outside the apartment must be done on the run, she said.

Orenbuch's 14-year-old is now being sent to school outside Sderot, where it is safer, but the minutes waiting for the bus seem interminable. Thankfully, a lady near the bus stop has befriended the kids and offered her home as a shelter in case an incoming missile is detected.

Once, when Orenbuch had most of her kids in the car, the siren went off just as they entered a busy traffic roundabout. Residents of Sderot have been instructed to stop their cars and seek shelter immediately, as sirens give only about 20 seconds notice before the missiles strike. If they find no shelter, they are told to lie flat on the ground.

On this particular occasion, she couldn't stop immediately and her oldest son, who is 12, began to panic. His screaming triggered panic attacks in the other children, and she soon had a car full of wailing, frightened children. After a few moments, she managed to stop the car, and luckily, the Qassam did not land nearby.

After calming her kids, she dropped her son off at school and met with the local psychologist to ask her to speak with her son. It turns out the psychologist had received many similar requests that day.

In the years the Qassams have been coming, the Orenbuch family have been lucky. One missile landed behind their apartment in a building under construction only a few dozen metres away. No one was hurt.

Another incident was even more unnerving. Last year, Orenbuch's husband, a principal at the local religious school, was davening with the children in shul and kept them a little longer than usual. A Qassam slammed into their classroom nearby. Had he kept a normal schedule that day, the class would have been full. Amit noted that the rocket came through the ceiling and hit the room not far from where he normally sits.

Such is life in Sderot these days. The tension is high, and many people, whose nerves cannot hold out, have left for respite in other parts of the country.

Orenbuch is adamant that her family is going nowhere. They originally moved to Sderot to help the community demographically and to offer their skills as educators. What's more, to leave now would be giving Arab terrorists just what they want, she said.

"People left the Gaza Strip. We did our [part]. Now it's time for peace and quiet," she said.

And, she continued, where in Israel will it be safe? Today, it's Sderot, tomorrow Ashkelon, then Ashdod, and ultimately they will try to hit even Tel Aviv.

Sari Kalimi has a similar attitude. An occupational therapist who moved to Sderot from Be'er Sheva 7½ years ago, she is adamant that her family will not leave.

"It's my home," she said. "This is my country. I'm proud to live here in Israel. I feel a lot of soldiers were killed in wars so we could live here."

When the family moved to the development town, "Sderot was a very nice place to live. It has a nice community" with a small-town feel, where "people know each other."

That was before the Qassams started raining down – and before she started a family that now includes three children, aged seven, five and two.

They moved so that her husband could study at Yeshivat Hesder of Sderot while performing military duty.

They remained, and even when the Qassams started coming five years ago, they ignored advice from their parents to move out.

So far, the closest a Qassam has landed is about 20 metres from their home. No one was hurt, but the bursting rocket shattered the living room window and left broken glass everywhere.

Kalimi knows she was lucky, far luckier than a friend who works at the same school as she does. Her friend lost her four-year-old son to a Qassam three years ago.

With the Palestinians' home-made rockets landing regularly these days, elementary school has been cancelled and kids are at home. Kalimi's youngest is in day care a 15-minute drive out of town where it is safer.

When her five-year-old daughter was in school, the little girl and 30 other children spent their day in a bomb shelter. "They can't go out. It's very difficult to put a child underground and not go out and play like children are supposed to play," Kalimi said.

At home, Kalimi tries to maintain as normal a lifestyle as possible. So far, her kids haven't displayed some of the stress reactions other Sderot youngsters have shown – wetting their pants, nightmares.

Just last week, two missiles landed a few hours apart in the early morning. The first came down at 6:30 a.m. "We heard the siren, and after 10 seconds, we heard a gigantic boom. The Qassam fell right behind our house. Nobody was hurt."

Three hours later, "there was another Qassam that fell close to our house. That hit a house. People were inside, but baruch HaShem [thank God], nobody was hurt. The house was badly damaged.

"It was scary. It was horrible. You don't want it to happen again."

Kalimi believes the best way for her kids to get through without developing anxiety symptoms is for no one to panic. "Our kids are very trained. They know exactly what to do when we hear the siren. I think that helps," she said.

"It's best just to continue with the normal routine. I believe that's the best for us and our children. But it's not a normal life. I can't take my kids to the park. We don't go out much, just to a little garden at the house.

"People have to know something very bad is happening here. People's lives are in danger. It's not a joke. Qassams kill and ruin people's lives."

She is grateful for the support the people of Sderot have received from other Israelis. Many volunteers have arrived to watch the kids, give parents a respite and provide escapes from the constant danger.

But she's quite angry at the government, which she blames for letting down the people of Sderot.

"Somebody's not doing their job," she said. "I'm no prime minister or in charge of the army. It seems that if somebody attacks you in any other part of the world and your life is in danger, something has to be done."

Orenbuch agrees and believes the Israeli government is overly concerned about international reaction and the possible effect of retaliation.

She and her neighbours are angry that the government has failed to defend its citizens. "I don't think any European or North American country would be quiet" under the circumstances facing Israel, Orenbuch said.

"I don't think anybody I know wants to hurt civilians or families. Palestinians have families. But if there was no choice… shoot at the Qassam launchers [even if] you might hit kids nearby… It's very sad, but they won't be able to kill us. We can defend ourselves that way. What is a country supposed to defend, their children or our children? We think it's weakness on the part of the government."

Moti (he asked that his last name not be used) believes the Israeli government is not doing enough to protect Sderot. "It's a disgrace that the government isn't doing more," he said. "It's like they're leaving the citizens here and doing nothing.

"We have to understand we're dealing with enemies and deal with them like an enemy. We have to fight."

Geneva shul fire was arson

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GENEVA — The fire that heavily damaged Geneva's largest synagogue was caused by arson, an investigation has concluded, the presiding magistrate said June 1.

The cause of the fire was criminal, said a statement by magistrate Michel Graber, who has been overseeing the investigation into the May 24 fire. But he said there had been no indication that it was set by extremists.

The May 24 blaze raised fears among Geneva's Jewish community that the fire might have been an anti-Semitic attack.

Contrary to earlier theories, the investigation has excluded the possibility that the fire was the result of an accident or technical problem, Graber said.

He said a DNA sample was taken from a cigarette butt found in the area where the fire started, but it was possible it may prove inconclusive because of damage from the heat of the fire and the water used to extinguish the blaze.

A number of witnesses have been interviewed by police, but so far have failed to point to a suspect, Graber said.

The fire caused serious damage to the interior of the Hekhal Haness Synagogue, which was built in the early 1970s The fire blew out windows and destroyed stairs and books. Other parts of the synagogue, located in the residential area of Malangou, were severely damaged by the water used to extinguish the flames.

Graber's statement did not detail the findings on which he based his conclusion, nor whether the incident was anti-Semitic.

Switzerland's president, Micheline Calmy-Rey, issued a statement expressing sadness and concern after the announcement that the fire was an act of arson. She conveyed solidarity with the Jewish community and said anti-Semitic acts are unacceptable and an insult to Switzerland's tradition of dialogue.

The announcement took many by surprise in Geneva's Jewish community, where the fire had already been accepted as accidental. The synagogue's founder, Nissim Gaon, initially said he was convinced that an electrical short circuit was the culprit.

The president of the umbrella organization Swiss Federation of Jewish Communities (FSCI), Alfred Donath, claimed the June 1 announcement proves that the fire was inspired by anti-Semitism. The Jewish community in Geneva, however, has taken a more cautious line.

Johanne Gurfinkiel, secretary-general of the Geneva-based Intercommunity Co-ordination against Anti-Semitism and Defamation (CICAD), said the community is shocked and greatly concerned, and is calling on the authorities to make every effort to see the investigation through.

The badly damaged synagogue is the largest of six in Geneva, and can accommodate 1,200 worshippers. Most of the damage was in the front part of the building. The Torah scrolls and other religious objects in the synagogue were removed intact by the rescue crews.

Gaon's wife, Renee, promised the synagogue would be restored by Rosh Hashanah. She said the shul is insured, but if additional money is needed, "my husband is ready to pay the rest."

Israeli Holocaust survivors suffering, critics charge

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

The plight of destitute Holocaust survivors in Israel has touched off a war of words in Israel and the Diaspora.

Two hundred and fifty thousand survivors, the greatest such concentration in the world, reside in Israel. Close to 80,000, or almost one-third, are reportedly impoverished.

"These survivors can barely afford the medications they need and can barely live on their own without any help," Jonny Konig, a reader wrote in a bristling letter to the editor of The Canadian Jewish News recently. "What an embarrassment. It's a shame to think that several European countries have done more than Israel for the care of its Holocaust survivors."

Dow Marmur, rabbi emeritus at Toronto's Holy Blossom Temple and a survivor, was just as indignant. In a recent column in the CJN, he observed, "It's a shame of historic proportions."

The problem has been acknowledged by Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert.

Last month, at a special Knesset ceremony marking the 62nd anniversary of the Allied victory over Nazi Germany, he said: "We are obligated to recognize our wrongs and to admit that there are thousands of survivors living below the poverty line."

Promising to take remedial measures, Olmert noted that every survivor should be able to live in dignity.

Some critics, such as former World Jewish Congress vice-president Isi Leibler, contend that the Conference of Jewish Material Claims Against Germany – known as the Claims Conference – is to blame for the situation.

Founded in 1951, the Claims Conference, based in New York City, administers and allocates restitution funds to survivors and provides them with social welfare services.

In an interview, Leibler charged that the Claims Conference should have dealt with this situation urgently.

"It failed to do so," said Leibler, who divides his time between Australia and Israel. "If the Claims Conference had fulfilled its role, no survivor – in Israel or anywhere – would be living in poverty."

Eli Pfefferkorn, a Toronto survivor, claimed that funds have been misallocated, to the detriment of survivors.

Citing an example, he said the March of the Living – which sends Jewish teens on trips to the sites of death camps in Europe, and then on to Israel – receives huge allocations from the Claims Conference, but that such funds would be better spent if they were channelled to survivors.

Hillary Kessler-Godin, a Claims Conference spokesperson, said the overwhelming majority of needy survivors in Israel hail from the former Soviet Union.

"Like many elderly [Soviet] immigrants, their economic conditions are not good," she said.

In a stiff rebuttal to detractors, Kessler-Godin added that the Claims Conference has done its best to look after survivors.

"In Israel, we have allocated $400 million [US] since 1995, effectively revolutionizing care to survivors. Another $100 million has been allocated in Israel for 2007 and 2008. Claims Conference allocations have spurred a recognition and support network for the special needs of survivors, which largely did not exist before we assumed this responsibility."

Twelve years ago, the Claims Conference helped establish the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel, she said. "Claims Conference allocations since then have grown each year."

These funds provide vital home care services – from housekeeping to bathing assistance – to 11,000 survivors, she pointed out.

"The Claims Conference has also helped build and upgrade nursing homes and geriatric hospital units caring for survivors; establish day cares and rehabilitation facilities; build and renovate housing for Nazi victims; provide medical equipment and assistance, and in many other ways has vastly improved the survivors' quality of life as they age."

In addition, in 2006, the Claims Conference paid more than $167 million in direct compensation payments to Israeli survivors and directed funds to the Jewish Agency for Holocaust-related educational and teacher training programs in Israel, Russia and eastern Europe.

"These programs are for youth and educators, varying in duration and intensity and including trips to the sites of Nazi atrocities," she said.

In the May 28 edition of The Jerusalem Report, Zeev Factor, chair of the Foundation for the Benefit of Holocaust Victims in Israel, offered an explanation for the prevalence of poverty among survivors in Israel.

"There are several reasons," he said.

"Most survivors who came to Palestine after the war had their education permanently disrupted. Many took low-paying jobs as long as it provided permanent employment… By age 65, the typical Israeli survivor was subsisting on about $1,000 per month… But geriatric illness wiped out savings because many medicines are not covered by national health insurance, and nursing home care in Israel, besides being of poor quality, is also not covered."

Further, survivors who remained in the Soviet Union and eastern Europe in the aftermath of the war were not permitted to apply for pensions.

"Indeed, large numbers of survivor immigrants, who started coming [to Israel] in 1991, had never received anything and were poor."

To assist these immigrants, the Claims Conference established a special hardship fund paid for by Germany.

"Some were helped," wrote Factor, "but not enough."

The Claims Conference says that more than 500,000 survivors in 75 countries have received compensation payments totalling more than $60 billion since its founding.

Last year alone, allocations of approximately $220 million were made in 42 countries.

Israel Briefs

Barak, Ayalon in runoff

Amir Peretz was ousted as Labor Party chief. A May 28 primary ended in a near draw between former Israeli prime minister Ehud Barak and retired admiral Ami Ayalon, neither of whom passed the threshold of votes – 40 per cent – for an outright win. They will now face each other in a June 13 runoff. Barak came out ahead in the first round, with 35.6 per cent of votes to Ayalon's 30.6 per cent. But he is expected to have greater difficulty in drawing Peretz and his supporters, who accounted for 22.4 per cent of votes, to his side. Both Ayalon, 61, the former Shin Bet security services chief, and Barak, 65, have said they will remove Labor from the ruling coalition unless Prime Minister Ehud Olmert steps down or sets a date for early elections.

Israel to release funds

Israel is prepared to transfer withheld tax revenues to the Palestinians provided no money reaches the Hamas-led government. Israeli officials said that Israel would release the estimated $700 million (US) once a mechanism was in place with safeguards to ensure none of it reaches terrorist elements, Reuters reported. Israel stopped transfers of the tax revenues it collects on behalf of the Palestinians after Hamas won parliamentary elections in January 2006. Israel increasingly has found itself isolated on this issue, as the United States and Europe have moved to allow funds to be transferred to the Palestinians under restricted conditions.

Hamas pledges more attacks

A leader of Hamas said attacks against Israel will continue regardless of whether they are effective. Khaled Meshal, the Damascus-based political leader of Hamas, said it's the right of the Palestinians to resist "Zionist aggression," and he rejected the three conditions laid out by the international community for recognition of Hamas, the Guardian reported. Meshal said those conditions – recognition of Israel, an end to violence and acceptance of previous peace agreements with Israel – are a "pretext" to demanding the amendment of the Hamas Charter, which calls for Israel's destruction.

Livni warns Europe

Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni said Europe must stand up to Hamas. Livni delivered a strong message to European leaders May 30 during her visit in Prague with Czech Foreign Minister Karel Schwarzenberg. "It is important that Europe understands that the Palestinian government is controlled by a terror organization which has officially claimed responsibility for terror attacks and the firing of Qassam rockets," Livni told reporters. "Any European attempt to differentiate between the responsibility of the Palestinian government and the Hamas terror organization interferes with the fight against terror."

Peres candidacy official

Shimon Peres announced his run for Israel's presidency. "After much thought I have decided to satisfy all the requests that I be a candidate for president," the 83-year-old deputy prime minister said in accepting the Kadima party's endorsement of his run for head of state. The successor to President Moshe Katsav will be elected June 13 in a Knesset ballot. Peres, who lost to Katsav in the 2000 run, is now up against Reuven Rivlin of the Likud Party and Colette Avital of Labor.

Israeli economy hums

The Israeli economy is in its largest sustained expansion. Globes Online reported that since middle of the second intifadah in 2003, the Israeli economy has grown 18.3 per cent – its largest period of sustained growth since Israel's independence. In the first quarter of this year, the economy grew at a rate of 6.3 per cent, after rising at a rate of 7.3 per cent in the previous quarter. The growth was attributed mainly to an increase in the export of goods and services, more fixed assets investments and greater private consumption. Unemployment continues to fall, dropping to 7.7 per cent this quarter from 7.8 per cent last quarter.

Aphasia: A world beyond words

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Jack Geller has been active in the Jewish community for decades, but he couldn't tell you about it.

He is an honorary life president of Holy Blossom Temple, was the youngest president of Jewish Immigrant Aid Services of Canada and was involved with Canadian Jewish Congress, among other activities.

Geller also had two successful careers – as a lawyer and as chair of the Ontario Securities Commission.

But he can't speak about any of his accomplishments.

Five years ago, Geller had a stroke during the second Passover seder, and he has lived with aphasia ever since.

Aphasia is a communication disorder caused by injury to the brain, usually as a result of a stroke or head injury. People with aphasia are intellectually competent, but have difficulty with language. Aphasia can affect the ability to speak, understand, read and write, and can thus mask a person's true intelligence.

An estimated 20 to 25 per cent of stroke sufferers develop aphasia, and at least 100,000 Canadians live with the disorder. Aphasia can be mild, manifesting itself in slow speech and searching for words, or extremely severe, to the point where a person has no speech at all.

Geller's aphasia is severe. He makes a lot of sounds, but few of them are recognizable words.

"He can't speak, but he can communicate," says his wife, Sybil, who calls aphasia an "invisible disorder" that few know about. People with aphasia rely on pictures and other tools to help express themselves.

After the stroke, Jack was comatose for several days and completely paralyzed on his right side. He was told he would never walk.

"He recovered, amazing everybody," Sybil said. While his speech will never be the same, Jack has seen improvement over the last five years.

"He can put some sentences together but not consistently. Aphasia is inconsistent. Just when you think you've got something, it's gone… You think, 'Oh wonderful, there's progress,' and then it's gone," she says.

"You don't know what the trigger is because it doesn't depend on being tired or being confused – this is one of the horrors of aphasia."

She says Jack's involvement with the Aphasia Institute has been a major factor in his improvement over the last half-decade.

"It absolutely saved our lives; it made sense of everything," says Sybil, who describes her husband's stroke and the period after it as a "very low time."

The Aphasia Institute is a Toronto organization in that focuses on training, education and outreach about the disorder. It also offers programs including conversation circles and recreational activities for people with aphasia, through its Pat Arato Aphasia Centre.

Sybil and Jack attended the 12-week introductory program for families. Since then, Jack has been a member of the Toastmasters International Aphasia Gavel Club.

"It's unique, there isn't another one in the world for people with aphasia," Sybil says of the public speaking club.

She still attends the family support group. Both Gellers have sat on various committees at the institute and have been involved in fundraising. They founded the Jack Geller Fund. "We do everything we can to fundraise for it," Sybil says.

Jack was 72 and had just retired when he had his stroke, but this is not the case for many others.

"Just think of young people, people who have a family and they're a wage earner," she says. "What do they do? Think of what it does to a family."

She says their own family's support was crucial to the healing process.

"I must emphasize the importance of family and friends in recovery, in quality of life."

The Gellers' seven grandsons continue to visit Jack for lunch regularly as if nothing has changed since 2002.

Sybil worked in health-care services all her life, and had an aunt with aphasia, but didn't know what it was until Jack's experience.

"I couldn't pronounce it, I couldn't even spell it," says the former president of the Ontario Red Cross, who also sat on the board of the Ontario Cancer and Research Foundation for six years and was involved with the Heart and Stroke Foundation.

Sybil cites Wheel Trans as an example of why she refers to aphasia as an invisible disorder. Jack is not physically limited and therefore is not a candidate for the assisted transportation system. But since he can't read much more than headlines and can get confused, using public transit is usually not possible.

She says life can "never be normal," but the Gellers do what they can to live it to its fullest. They have travelled worldwide and attend some theatre productions and concerts.

But aphasia continues to present challenges, Sybil says.

"When you have a powerful person you've lived with, who could take initiative – now he has to have his routine, and anything out of the routine confuses him. For someone who has been in control of not only his life… but contributed tremendously to the community, [it's difficult to adjust]."

The Aphasia Institute is hosting an afternoon for Aphasia Awareness Day on June 14, 2:30 to 5 p.m., and the Gellers will be attending.

"Anything we can do to bring awareness to the public is important so that there is understanding," Sybil says.

The institute's event is geared to health professionals, people with aphasia and anyone who wants to learn more about the disorder. Called A Partnership of Hope, the afternoon features a prominent neurologist, Dr. Sandra Black, as the keynote speaker, as well as demonstrations of aphasia-friendly resources and programs, a speech by a Gavel Club member, a performance by the Aphasia Institute Drum Circle and a workshop for health professionals.

The Rock

The silence of dawn was broken by the bleating of the sheep, led by the shepherd Akiva across the vast estates of Calba Savua. Spring had come to the upper Galilee, and the air was bursting with the rich scent of lilacs. Akiva took a deep breath and smiled. Life was good.

Or was it? Deep down, his thoughts tormented him. Is this what I should be doing with my life? I'm 40 years old already, and what am I? Just a shepherd. I don't even know how to read! I wish I could be like the Torah scholars, discussing wisdom, seeking truth.

Akiva twirled his shepherd's staff and shook his head, trying to rid himself of the impossible fantasy. Ah, why would I want to be a Torah scholar? They seem so stuck up, keeping to themselves.

He stopped, and the staff went limp in his hand.

He trudged on, lost in empty dreams.

The sheep started bleating, and Akiva looked up. They had already reached the river. He quickly scanned the area to find an open space to bring the flock. There. Away from the trees, where the river bent. He headed toward the water, the flock behind him. The sheep piled to the riverbank, and Akiva squatted down to rest. He had to wait for them to drink their fill.

His eyes wandered. Beyond the bend, the river dropped abruptly, cascading down in a frothing waterfall. He went over to take a look. Most of the water plunged straight down, churning in the riverbed below. Off to the sides, however, tiny streams broke off and took the long route, gently wandering around the moss-covered rocks before eventually rejoining the river below.

Akiva's eyes followed the rushing waters. That's when he noticed the rock. At first glance, there was nothing extraordinary about it. Just your everyday riverside rock, dull gray in colour. But there was something very peculiar about this rock. It had a hole through its centre, a hole that went all the way through from top to bottom. Akiva leaned over, studying it. The hole is perfectly round, smooth and even. What in the world could have caused it? Akiva was still pondering the mystery when a drop of water fell from an overhanging ledge, plunged straight through the hole in the rock, and broke up into tiny droplets on the moist ground below.

So that's what carved the hole. Dripping water has pierced the rock and penetrated it. Over vast amounts of time, tiny drops of water have accomplished through perseverance what even he strongest knife could not do.

And then realization struck. If a rock this hard could be broken by something so soft, then anything's possible, if you try hard enough. Anything.

Akiva raised his eyes to the clear sky, Please God, he begged, help me. Help me learn your Torah. Help me become a true scholar. May the words of Your Torah penetrate my heart the way water broke through this rock.

He realized that he was crying.

He sat there for a long time, until the sheep began to call.

Reluctantly, he stood up.

Today he would have to bring back the sheep, but tomorrow? Tomorrow he would begin to study.

The future shone in all its glory. ❢

Montreal poet makes a sharp political turn

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

For David Solway, a Montreal poet, teacher, literary critic and editor, it was a defining event that ineluctably changed him.

He was vacationing on the remote Greek island of Tilos when that wrenching day of infamy intruded on his life and reshaped his views.

On Sept. 11, 2001, 19 Arab hijackers, all dispatched by Al Qaeda, crashed commercial airliners into the World Trade Center in Manhattan and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., killing thousands of civilians and highlighting the threat posed by Islamic radicalism.

"It was an axial moment," said Solway, comparing Sept. 11 to a shrill and rude awakening. "It politicized me, pulling me out of my narcissistic preoccupations."

With the trauma still fresh and smouldering in his mind, Solway took early retirement from his job as a professor of English at John Abbott College to research and write a book about its far-ranging implications.

Recently published by Lester, Mason & Begg, and distributed by Random House Canada, The Big Lie: On Terror, Anti-Semitism and Identity comes off as a hard-bitten, polemical work by someone whose ideas and assumptions were completely upended and buried in the avalanche of a single, cataclysmic event.

"This book was written against the grain as I came to realize that I had been wrong about nearly everything," he writes with bracing frankness in the preface.

In an interview, Solway said that Sept. 11 forced him to make a 180 degree turn that inalterably transformed him.

From a leftist who had been instinctively anti-American and pro-Palestinian, Solway has morphed into a rightist who fervently supports Israel, identifies with the United States, votes for the Conservative party in Canada and warns of the dangers of resurgent, radicalized Islam.

Once, though, Solway was insulated from the hurly-burly of politics, content to lose himself in the purity of literature.

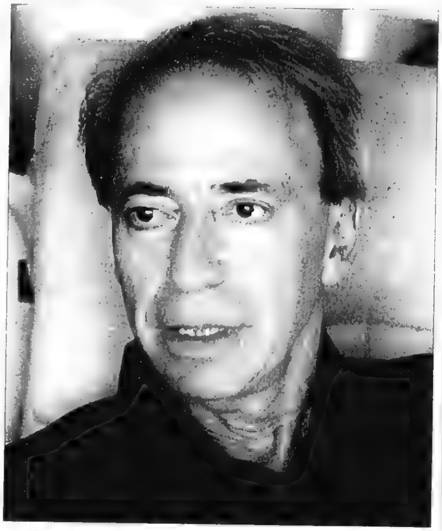
He is the author of more than 40 works of poetry and criticism, ranging from Modern Marriage to Director's Cut. He has contributed to literary journals such as The Sewanee Review. He has been a writer-in-residence at Concordia University. Currently, he is an associate editor of Books in Canada.

The shock of Sept. 11 gave Solway pause, pushing him to the belief that the political world is neither unimportant nor irrelevant.

Indeed, the terrorist rampage was a watershed insofar as he was concerned. It led him to the realization that politics is as vital as a poet's imaginative realm, that the "utopian period" after the major wars of 1914 and 1939 had run its course, and that he, as a Jew and a citizen of the West, was now personally at risk.

"I should have known better," he said ruefully in a reference to St. Agathe, the largely French Canadian town in Quebec's Laurentian Mountains where he was raised by a gentle mother and a domineering father, a racketeer and dead ringer for Joseph Stalin who twice tried to kill Solway.

When he was 12 years old, Solway was attacked by his neighbour and supposedly closest friend, a Quebecois who shouted maudit Juif as he viciously assaulted him, leaving a permanent scar on his forehead and a sense of betrayal that he still nurses.



David Solway

"I didn't understand why I was targeted," said Solway, a man of deep passions and stream-of-consciousness litanies. "But now I understand. I was targeted because, regardless of who I am, I was a Jew. Being a Jew is forever. You can't deny it. You can't un-Jew yourself."

Before Sept. 11, Solway was only dimly aware of being Jewish, the St. Agathe incident notwithstanding.

He considered himself a "non-Jewish Jew" in the mould of Isaac Deutscher, the Polish-born, British historian, journalist and commentator who penned a Marxist-tinged biography of the Soviet revolutionary Leon Trotsky.

But after Sept. 11, Solway knew that he was duty-bound to re-examine his views mercilessly. Yet, he admitted, "it was very difficult accepting that I had been wrong about so many things."

After a reading binge that enabled him to substantiate and refine his arguments for The Big Lie, Solway knew that he had reached a new and higher level of consciousness.

It is encapsulated in a telling paragraph: "We must recognize that terror and anti-Semitism are ultimately related … We must come to terms with the fact that we are under sustained attack and that we will have to respond courageously…"

In this spirit, he came to two conclusions. The 9/11 hijackers were inspired by a theologically inspired form of terrorism that feeds into anti-Semitism. The liberal left ignores the incompatibility between Islam and democracy.

Using Michel Houellebecq's controversial novel, Platform, as a platform for a critical consideration of Islam, Solway argues that it is out of step with modernity and lacks mechanisms to resist extremist tendencies.

In addition, he writes, Islam is "intrinsically hostile" to western values and poses "a devastating threat to the civilized world."

Adding that moderate Muslims have done little to try to check extremists, he said, "Islam is not a religion of peace, no matter what people say. It's a religion of war and jihad. Read the Qur'an! It's all there."

In a reference to Samuel Huntington's theory about the civilizational clash between Islam and the West, Solway observed, "The world can't live with theocratic Islam. We're in a state of war with it."

A thrice-married father of four whose wife is a German Catholic, he fears that the West will lose the struggle and that his children and grandchildren will be compelled to live under Sharia law.

His opinions concerning Israel's future are just as apocalyptic.

As he put it, "Israel will never have peace with the Arabs and, like ancient Sparta, will have to remain on a war footing."

He contends that Arab hatred of Israel is rooted in Islamic beliefs and that Palestinian land claims are historically spurious.

Proclaiming that Israel's pre-1967 borders are basically indefensible, he said that Israeli territorial concessions will spawn further turbulence and demands.

Whatever international pressure may be brought to bear, Israel should retain the Golan Heights and the mountain ridges of the West Bank, Solway stated.

He warned that Israel will not be secure after signing hasty peace agreements.

"Peace now is war later," he claimed.

Solway acknowledged that his "conversion" to conservatism has alienated friends and acquaintances who once shared his views.

But being an iconoclast, he hardly cares. "I have my convictions, and I've earned them."

Jews and Palestinian Arab fish for laughs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It was business as usual when the Israeli-Palestinian Comedy Tour rolled into Toronto last week.

Thousands of kilometres away, the Israeli Air Force struck a Hamas training camp in the Gaza Strip and Israeli troops killed two Hamas militants in a gun battle during a cross-border raid into Gaza. Meanwhile, Hamas fired three Qassam rockets into the western Negev.

But at Roy Thomson Hall in downtown Toronto, the continuing strife in the Mideast seemed surreal as four cheeky standup comedians trolled for laughs.

Three of the jesters were Jewish and one was a Palestinian Christian.

So where was the Muslim?

Never mind.

As the one-night-only show got under way, a sonorous voice boomed: "To Israelis, no home demolitions. To Palestinians, please disarm explosive belts."

'Continuing strife in the Mideast seemed surreal'

The self-deprecating tone having been established, the foursome – Aaron Freeman, Charley Warady, Ray Hanania and Yisrael Campbell – wrung chuckles and laughter from an appreciative audience consisting of about 900 Jews, Christians and Muslims.

"We're cracking jokes for peace," said Freeman, a Chicago-born African- American convert to Judaism. "To prove that we can get along, at least for two hours."

Explaining his conversion, the gravel-voiced Freeman joked, "I really became a Jew to confuse the Nation of Islam."

In a gentle jab at himself and haredim in Israel, he said, "We had to move out because the neighbourhood went black. They didn't mean me."

Warady, an American Jew who has appeared on the Comedy Central network and made aliyah a decade ago, poked fun at Israelis who can't keep dents off their new cars, corruption in high places, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's unpopularity and El Al Airlines.

If you buy a new car in Israel, you might as well take a hammer to it so as to avoid heartache, he advised.

In a biting reference to the scandals that have enveloped Israeli cabinet ministers of late, he said that a criminal record is a job requirement for Israeli pols.

Ripping into El Al, Warady opined that it is the world's sole airline that offers standing room only.

In a dig at Olmert, he said that his current ratings are so miserable that U.S. President George W. Bush looks good by comparison.

Without missing a beat, Warady also skewered Amir Peretz, who lost the leadership of the Labor party in last week's primary, and Shimon Peres, the Kadima party's candidate for Israel's presidency.

Hanania, a former Chicago newspaper columnist whose parents hail from Bethlehem and Jerusalem, framed his black humour within the context of the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks in the United States.

"Usually, they don't let me into buildings so big," he observed in dead-pan fashion. "Something happens to you, I go to jail for 18 months."

Professing not to be a terrorist, he said, "I pay people to do that."

Saving a few choice words for this country, he said, "Canada isn't violent enough for me."

After tossing off a ribald joke about vibrators and airport security, he confided that the question he is asked most often at airports is: "Are you on my flight?"

In a play on words concerning the abundance of Arab fossil fuel, Hanania remarked, "Just because we have oil doesn't make us crude."

Turning more serious, he disclosed that he and his Jewish wife divided their house on the basis of the partition of Palestine. She allocated 78 per cent for herself and only 22 per cent for him.

In a stinging parting shot, he said that if Israel's security "wall" is a "fence," then the Western Wall should be called the Western Fence.

Campbell, an Irish Italian Catholic from Philadelphia who converted to Judaism in the mid-1990s and now lives as a haredi Jew in Israel, appeared on the stage all in black.

"Is it warm in here, or am I the only one dressed for 17th-century Poland?"

Campbell, whose first name was originally Christopher, talked excitedly about his journey from Reform and Conservative Judaism to strict Orthodoxy and his immigration to Israel.

In cutting asides, he said, "There is a Hebrew word for hell – ulpan," and thanked his lucky stars that he was circumcised in a hospital.

He, too, took a swipe at the culture of corruption among Israeli politicians. As he put it in the course of a monologue, "The entire government is being indicted."

The jokesters were applauded as they wrapped, and as the crowd filed out of the cavernous hall, an old Japanese woman in granny glasses leaned on her cane and told a friend, "This was a totally different experience."

You know what? She was right.

Thomas O. Hecht, a retired Montreal businessman – in the 1970s he replaced his father as president of Continental Pharma Canada – and founder of the Begin-Sadat Center for Strategic Studies at Bar-Ilan University in Israel, has published a memoir of his family's former life in Bratislava and their struggles in escaping the Nazis and reaching the New World.

Czech Mate, A Life in Progress is Hecht's story as told to Joe King, the prodigious and prolific Montreal author and broadcaster. The book features a foreword by Ambassador Meir Rosenne and some enviably detailed and coloured genealogical charts, and was published by Yad Vashem Publications of Jerusalem.

At the outbreak of World War II, the Hecht family (father, mother, daughter, son) fled Czechoslovakia, reached France shortly before the German destruction of the French army, then spent months dodging their murderous enemies as they sought an escape route to Canada or America. Ultimately a Slovakian diplomat in Madrid supplied them with the precious documents needed to reach Lisbon, the last Atlantic port in Europe available for escaping refugees.

Off-Broadway comedy Jewtopia comes to Toronto

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Two young theatre producers are bringing the hit off-Broadway comedy Jewtopia, a "goy-meets-girl" love story, to Toronto.

First-time producers Lindsey Steinberg, 24, and Matthew Tishler, 20, are staging the show, about the search for the perfect Jewish girl, at the Diesel Playhouse, where it has its Canadian première on Sept. 23.

Steinberg got the idea to bring Jewtopia to Toronto last December, after watching an episode of The View on which Bryan Fogel and Sam Wolfson, the original Jewtopia writers, actors and producers, were guests.

"I thought, 'This is so perfect for Toronto, I really need to do something about this,'" said Steinberg, who is a recent York University theatre studies and bachelor of education grad.

Then Steinberg teamed up with Tishler, whom she met four years earlier when she hired him for Acting Out, a children's after-school theatre program she founded.

"We just kept thinking this is so great for Toronto because this is such a funny show, and there just seems to be this buzz around about Jewish humour," she said.

The pair flew to New York to see the show, the story of two single 30-year-olds who want to meet the perfect Jewish girl – but for different reasons.

Adam Lipschitz wants to make his Jewish family happy (but can't seem to land a date), and goy Chris O'Connell wants to marry a Jew so he never has to make another decision in his life.

The two make a pact: Adam will show Chris how to be a good "Jew," if Chris will teach Adam to score the Jewish chick of his parents' dreams.

Wolfson and Fogel opened the show in 2003 in Los Angeles, where it became the longest running comedy in the city's theatre history. Next came more than 1,000 performances in New York and the release of Jewtopia: The Chosen Book for the Chosen People in 2006.

Tishler and Steinberg obtained the rights to the show and teamed up with an experienced producer, Michael Rubinoff, to round out the production team.

"When you have people that are new to it, they come at questions and problems from a different direction. You really engage in a dialogue that lets you always find the best answer and the best idea," said Rubinoff.

[Abigail Bimman photo]

He notes that an example of this fresh thinking is the use of the popular social-networking-website-cum-marketing-tool Facebook, which he had never used for a production before. The Jewtopia Toronto Facebook group already has several hundred members.

Spunky and energetic, Tishler and Steinberg admit that first-time producers have a lot to learn. "Every day is different and every day is crazy," said Steinberg.

"But every day is completely enjoyable," Tishler chimed in.

He added that "when you license the rights to a play, you basically get a script and then it's your job from there – from script delivery to opening night."

The duo are in the process of launching their ad campaign and selecting the director and the rest of the creative team. Casting will begin mid-June.

"I think Jewtopia holds up a microscope into our lives an allows us to laugh... and that's the beauty of live theatre, it brings the community together to have a laugh, to reflect and to be entertaining," said Rubinoff.

Steinberg and Tishler are ready to prove to Toronto that Jewtopia will achieve that. To them, the new world of commercial theatre sometimes seems like a dream, but one they are very excited about.

"Sometimes I still don't believe it," said Steinberg. "I'm not going to believe we did this until I'm sitting in the theatre opening night."

Singer/songwriter's CD reflects journey to Orthodoxy

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Dana Mase, an Orthodox Jewish singer living in New York, has been on a long spiritual journey.

Raised in a household where Jewish practice was minimal, Mase struggled to find her own spiritual identity. She rebelled against Judaism and studied at a Christian missionary college before coming full circle and exploring her roots.

"It's been a long process and it's still evolving," said Mase of her journey. "I came to a realization in my life that God was real, and it's very important to build your life around faith and trying to get closer to God."

"The songs are an expression of where I'm at spiritually, and different struggles, and my relationship with HaShem as well as with other people," said Mase.

The Colours of Black and White is full of fresh sounds and varied musical arrangements. Some tracks, such as Dandelions, have a distinctive country twang, while others, for example Thread of Blue, have a darker resonance and reflect troubled emotions.

The acoustic sound and soft percussion found on many of the CD's songs could classify it as folk, but occasionally harsher guitar chords pull the music into a soft rock or pop genre.

Most of the tracks relate to Mase's spiritual voyage. Songs such as Seraphin and Seagulls and Beautiful Tears evoke pastoral images, reflective of a youth trying to make sense of the connections and importance of the past to her present and future.

One particularly evocative track is titled She Never Knew She Never Knew. While it has nothing to do with Judaism, Mase sings about the tragedy of people who were institutionalized as a result of misdiagnosed physical handicaps and learning disabilities, and who, as a result of institutionalization, became developmentally disabled.

Dana Mase

The subject of the song is a young girl who was placed in an institution because she limped at the age of five. The girl is now 78. Mase met with her to write the song and continues to visit her in the group home where she now lives.

"She's this beautiful spirit," Mase said. "She's a giving, wonderful woman, but this is how she spent her whole life, and unfortunately this [did] happen a lot."

The CD's title reflects Mase's concern about the fact that many people see the Jewish Orthodox world as divided into black and white. Mase believes that within that stereotypical divide there are many colours. She is against the classification and judgment that often stems from the black and white demarcations.

"If it was a perfect world, I'd say OK, we're all Jews, we're all on this journey…maybe one person was born with a father who was a rabbi and one person was born with a father who is a drunk. That wasn't anyone's choice, HaShem decided that. So classifying each other, I think just works against us all," Mase explained.

Mase would like to encourage other women to pursue what they are good at and push the conventional boundaries that society has established.

"Whatever it is, just go for it. HaShem will open doors or not," she said.

Concert captures the history of Israel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

An eclectic celebration of Israeli music, culture and history will be featured in an upcoming concert at Beth Tikvah Synagogue.

Entitled Israel Then and Now, the multimedia show to jointly honour the milestones of Israel's 60th birthday and 40 years since Jerusalem reunited, will showcase cantors Tibor Kovari and Gideon Zelermyer, as well as Beth Tikvah music director Eyal Bitton and the Kachol Velavan Band.

The musicians will perform a collection of tunes that are redolent of Israel's storied journey through the ages.

Eyal Bitton

"Israel Then and Now is a concert that's meant to capture the history of Israel," relates Bitton, who is not only directing the show, but also playing the guitar in it.

"We selected songs from every decade, from the 1940s, right up to the present day."

In addition to celebrating Israel, Bitton notes the concert is also meant to serve as a cultural link between Israel and the North American Diaspora.

"Knowledge of Israeli music beyond the 1970s is rare amongst the Diaspora community," says Bitton.

"So we felt this concert was a way to bridge the gap between Israel and North America, the old and the new, as well as the classic pieces and the contemporary ones."

To spruce up the performances and make them strike a resounding chord with the largely non-Hebrew speaking audience, a multimedia display of historic and geographic images of Israel will be flashed across a projection screen.

As well, lyrics from the Hebrew songs will be translated into English on screen.

"Our congregants and community are not generally fluent in Hebrew, so we will have the translations to give them a better idea of what the songs are about," notes Kovari, who is the chazzan at Beth Tikvah.

"It's an extra element to the show that will add to the enjoyment of the program."

Kovari, the brainchild of the concert, says it was difficult to develop the musical lineup for the show because there are so many tunes he and Bitton love.

"If we included everything we wanted to, this would have been a three-day concert," quips the Romanian-born tenor.

While intent on building intrigue for the show and not giving away too many tidbits, Kovari did note the program will include classics from Israel's early days, as well as modern songs by famed Israeli musicians, such as Sarit Hadad and Eyal Golan.

Bitton was also tight lipped, but he did share this exciting detail:

"There's one moment when we look at the 1980s when Les Miserables was performed in Israel," he says.

"We will sing a song from the Israeli version of the famous musical."

And what does he hope the audience take away from the concert?

"I want them to have a wonderful time, to experience the joy and passion that I have for this music and to be aware of the richness and diversity of Israeli music," intones Bitton.

The show takes place on June 13. For tickets, call 416-221-3433 ext. 354. More information about the concert can be found by visiting www.musicabethtikvah.com.

Middle East topics top the list in former CIA director's memoirs

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

George Tenet, the director of the Central Intelligence Agency from 1997 to 2004, tells quite a rousing tale in his newly published memoir, At the Center of the Storm, My Years at the CIA.

Tenet's stewardship of America's largest espionage organization coincided with a rush of events: the Oslo peace process, the attacks against the United States by Al Qaeda on Sept. 11, 2001 and the American invasion of Iraq in March 2003.

It is fair to say that the Middle East consumed him. As he writes in the preface,"For better or worse, the twin topics of terrorism and Iraq would come to define my seven years as director of Central Intelligence."

The opening chapter of this interesting and hardhitting book turns on Tenet's personal role in developing a security plan that the Palestinian side could present to Israel at the 1998 Wye talks.

It was no easy task dealing with senior Palestinian officials, says Tenet. "It was sometimes hard to know where their official talking points stopped and their personal agendas began."

He claims that the then Israeli prime minister, Benjamin Netanyahu, tried to use the Wye negotiations to free Jonathan Pollard, a U.S. naval analyst who was sentenced to life imprisonment for passing secrets to Israel.

Tenet was opposed to Pollard's release and said so without equivocation. "If you give them Pollard, I'm done," he told John Podesta, then-president Bill Clinton's chief of staff. Arguing that the Wye agreement was as much in Israel's interest as anyone else's, Tenet urged the Clinton administration to "hold fast."

And that is what happened. Pollard remains in jail.

Two years after Wye was signed and sealed, Tenet found himself at the Camp David summit, where the chief negotiators were Ehud Barak, the Israeli prime minister, and Yasser Arafat, the president of the Palestinian Authority.

Tenet had no illusions. "For starters, I knew, absolutely knew, that for the first three or four hours, we initially would have to listen to exactly what we had heard at previous meetings – a litany of grievances."

In Tenet's view, Arafat had no intention, like Barak, of reaching a permanent status accord. Having been bitterly disappointed by Barak's refusal to honour a promise to turn over three Arab villages near Jerusalem, Arafat no longer trusted him. Nevertheless, Arafat went to Camp David, anxious not to insult Clinton, he writes.

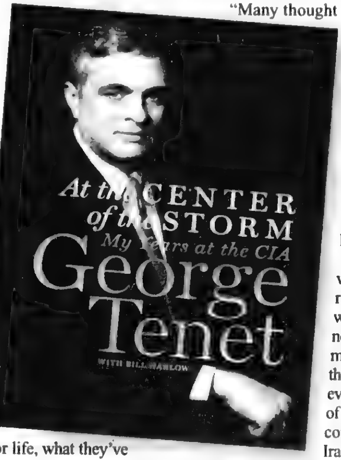
This issue notwithstanding, Tenet characterizes Arafat as a slippery fellow. "Trust with Arafat was always problematic," he observes. "Arafat always wanted one more thing, and one more thing was never enough because what he really wanted was for the peace process to be ever-active and eternally unresolved. Keeping the process going gave Arafat leverage. Walking up to the edge of agreeing and then backing away made him a central player on the world stage. It stamped him as legitimate."

He adds that Arafat did not want it to succeed in any way acceptable either to Israel or the United States.

Tenet, a Greek American, expresses affection and respect for Israel. "The truth is, I love the Israelis – their passion for life, what they've done to stand up for themselves, and what they've done in establishing their state – but I bonded with the Palestinians as well."

Tenet's discussion of Al Qaeda and its charismatic leader, Osama bin Laden, is instructive.

As early as 1993, he explains, the CIA knew that bin Laden was "a significant financial backer" of Islamic terrorist movements. By 1996, the CIA realized that he was not only a financier but a terrorist intent on striking the United States.



Shortly after he assumed office, Tenet issued a warning that Al Qaeda had a presence in more than 60 countries and had forged ties with Sunni extremists around the world. "We told Clinton that bin Ladin was planning between five and 15 attacks..."

Tenet shared his anxiety with the directors of various intelligence agencies, but did not receive the desired co-operation. "Many thought we had become obsessed. Others failed to understand fully how terrorists in their countries might be planning for attacks within ours." In this respect, Pakistan was "singularly unco-operative."

Pulling no punches, Tenet says that the Sept. 11 attacks were merely "the opening shot" of Al Qaeda's campaign. But he points out that, contrary to Bush administration claims, there was no evidence linking Iraq with Al Qaeda.

Suggesting that the United States was determined to unseat the Baathist regime of Saddam Hussein come what may, Tenet says that there was never "a serious debate" within the administration about "the imminence of the Iraqi threat." Nor did Bush officials ever engage in a significant discussion of the possible benefits of the enhanced containment of Iraq. By 2002, war in Iraq was "a forgone conclusion."

Tenet says that Saddam's supposed possession of weapons of mass destruction was not why the United States took action against Iraq.

The real, largely unarticulated reason was that regime change in Baghdad might democratize the Middle East. Quoting U.S. official Paul Wolfowitz, Tenet says that the administration trumpeted Iraq's weapons of mass destruction because it was "the one issue that everyone could agree on."

He admits that he should have scotched the illusion that Iraq had a vast stockpile of such weapons, but confesses that he did not because he was so focused on Al Qaeda.

Tenet was not overly impressed by the speech that the American secretary of state, Colin Powell, delivered before the United Nations which summarized the case against Iraq. "It was a great presentation, but unfortunately the substance didn't hold up. One by one, the various pillars of the speech, particularly on Iraq's biological and chemical weapons programs, began to buckle."

Describing the war in Iraq as a "runaway freight train," Tenet notes that post-war contingency planning was virtually nil. "The war, in short, went well, but peace was hell."

Singling out Washington's mistakes in the occupation of Iraq, he calls the order to de-Baathify Iraqi society as a short-sighted manoeuvre that destroyed what few "institutional foundations" were left in the country. Similarly, the dissolution of the Iraqi army was an error. These moves, combined with the lack of economic opportunity and political direction in the new Iraq, provided fuel for the current insurgency.

In closing, Tenet voices gloom about the future.

"The Middle East is less stable today than at any time in the past quarter century," he says. "The security of Israel is at greater peril than at any time I can remember."

Tenet criticizes the Bush administration for not having seriously tried to rejuvenate the now-defunct Oslo peace process. If it had done so, "we might have mitigated the agitation in the Sunni world and created an environment more conducive to regional peace and security and less hospitable to the forces of Islamic extremism."

In the same vein, Tenet says that the United States failed to capitalize on Arafat's death in 2004 "to create a political process that offered real hope to the Palestinian people."

Looking ahead, Tenet says that the struggle against international terrorism must be the United States' highest priority. "The campaign against terrorism will consume the next generation of Americans the way the Cold War dominated the lives of their parents and grandparents."

A sobering thought.

Brott music festival in Toronto, Hamilton and Muskoka

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

From jazz and pop hits, to opera and symphony classics, a diverse blend of musical genres and performing artists will converge this summer to present the 20th annual Brott Music Festival.

The three-month-long festival showcases a wide range of events, such as intimate recitals and feature concerts, presented in the Hamilton area, Toronto and Muskoka.

A rather unique aspect of the shows is performances by the National Academy Orchestra, which couples aspiring musicians with their experienced mentors.

"This program has a unique alchemy, with mentors and apprentices performing together," says Boris Brott, the founder and artistic director of the festival.

"It brings out the best in both types of performers."

Many of the artists, such as violinist Susanne Yi-Jia Hou and pianist Stewart Goodyear, have played with Brott's guidance since they were children.

Nurturing these musicians and giving them the platform to become professionals is quite meaningful to the esteemed music director.

"I was taught by Leonard Bernstein that if you give back, it's a form of tzedakah and that's what this festival really is," Brott relates.

The two Toronto performances on June 15 and 27 will take place in the CBC's Glenn Gould Studio.

They will feature various Beethoven classics by the Gryphon Trio, as well as Susanne Yi-Jia Hou, Alain Trudel and the National Academy Orchestra.

Another show of note is the L'Chayim! concert on Aug. 7 at the Adas Israel Synagogue in Hamilton, which celebrates 160 years of Jewish music.

"Audiences will be treated to very highly charged, energetic performances," enthuses the 63-year-old.

An internationally renowned conductor, music educator and public speaker, Brott presently conducts the New West Symphony in California, the National Arts Centre Orchestra of Canada and the McGill Chamber Orchestra in Montreal, which was founded by his parents, Alexander and Lotte, 67 years ago.

"I am continuing my parents' music legacy," says the proud son, noting his music education started very early on in life.

"My mother would set out my teddy bears, put bow ties on them and they would be my audience, while I gave concerts," he says.

In his illustrious career, Brott has guest conducted on five continents including before Pope John Paul II, produced numerous CDs, been awarded the Order of Canada, was made a Knight of Malta and has conducted more than 100 television programs.

The articulate musician is also a professional motivational speaker, giving more than 30 annual presentations that link music with business to Fortune 500 companies around the world.

For more information about the Brott Music Festival, visit www.brottmusic.com or phone 1-888-475-9377.

Concordia sends team to Israeli tournament

By BEN RABY
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Concordia University basketball coach John Dore has been to Israel enough times to know it has more to offer than the 6:30 news would have you believe. Dore's job this spring was to convince both his team and the university of just that.

In the end, he was successful, and the Stingers headed to Israel recently to participate in the Friendship Games in Tel Aviv, a one-week round-robin tournament at Tel Aviv University featuring 30 teams from 17 countries, including Russia, China, Serbia, Slovenia, Greece, Turkey and Jordan, as well as the Palestinian Authority. Concordia, which won the Quebec university championship, is the only North American team at the event.

Coaches attending the games were invited to two clinics, one at TAU featuring former NBA all-star Dominique Williams, and the other in Amman, Jordan, with the Hawks' assistant coach Herb Brown. Last week, the Stingers visited Be'er Sheva, where they played in a warm-up tournament.

The plan to bring the Stingers to Israel had been in the works since December, but it was not finalized until everybody got on board.

"It's a challenge to make any international trip, Israel or elsewhere," said Dore, Concordia's coach since 1989. "And to do it in our off-season makes things a little more complicated."

Shortly after the Stingers' season ended in March, Dore played travel agent, finalizing his team's 16-day trip to Israel. The onetime coach of Canada's Maccabiah team had all the contacts in place and invitations to the tournaments.

Still, he knew it would not be easy, given the costs, the security concerns and Concordia's previous dealings with issues related to Israel. The university was the scene of a violent protest in 2002 as anti-Israel ralliers prevented a speaking engagement by former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu.

"A trip like this does not happen overnight, and we would not be here without our players' commitment and the university's full support," Dore said. "The senior administration thought it was a great initiative."

90 per cent of the trip has been funded privately

While the trip was given the go-ahead, interpretations of the university's "full" support varied. The administration encouraged the team to go to Israel and the school's bookstore donated gifts for the trip, but Dore estimates more than 90 per cent of the trip has been funded privately.

"This is the chance of a lifetime for these guys, and we are lucky that people bought into it," he said. "This trip is not just about basketball. It's a chance to see different cultures, and to see another part of the world. Building the sightseeing into the trip was a huge selling point."

In addition to the basketball tournaments, the itinerary includes visits to the Dead Sea, Masada and Jerusalem. The combination of basketball with touring a foreign country made for a trip that was hard to refuse. When Dore asked his team if they were interested, the response was unanimously positive. Some could not believe what they were hearing.

"Where I come from," says Granby, Que. native Sebastien Martin, "all we know about Israel are bombings and wars, because it's the only thing we see on TV. So when I heard about our trip, I remember thinking, 'They have basketball there?' I had no idea."

Martin's family had its concerns, asking why the team could not go to Florida instead. "I had to explain that it's not just war in Israel. If coach [Dore] is bringing us there, it must be OK. I don't see him putting us in danger."

The first-year Stinger admits he was nervous heading in, but it did not take long before feeling at ease. "It's like everybody says, once you're here, you realize it's not dangerous everywhere. In Tel Aviv, I never even thought about [any threats]."

"This is an opportunity that had to be taken advantage of," said Jamal Gallier, a third-year Stinger and a religious Christian. "I'm happy to visit Jerusalem, to see the history after reading about it in the Bible. I'll be representing my family… I'm not sure if they will ever make it here."

Dore said he could sense the excitement building at practice in the week leading up to the trip.

"The guys were preparing themselves, asking about the sites, checking the Internet for weather and trying to figure out how many shekels can buy a meal at McDonald's."

"I didn't know too much about [Israel] before getting here," says team captain Patrick Perrotte. "I worked at a Jewish camp one summer, so I heard a little bit about Tel Aviv and what a great city it is, but to be here now is unbelievable."

Perrotte is the only member of the team who had ever been outside North America, and that could have remained unchanged had the private donations not come in or the Stingers backed away from their pledge to help raise money.

Among the many fundraisers was a Yom Ha'atzmaut basketball tournament and barbecue hosted by Hillel Concordia. The event was advertised primarily through word of mouth and e-mail, but that seemed to work just fine, and $1,300 was raised in one afternoon.

On campus, the trip was met with little reaction. Chances are high that only a small percentage of Concordia's student body was even aware of it. There was little advertising, and by the time the team had gone into full fundraising mode, the winter semester was over and students had left for the summer.

As for the basketball, Dore was invited to bring the Stingers to the Friendship Games by tournament founder and Atlanta Hawks owner Ed Peskowitz. The idea behind the tournament is to promote peace through sport.

Organizers got more than they bargained for in last year's inaugural event. One of the final pairings featured a team from the Palestinian Authority pitted against a team of Israelis, and to the surprise of many cynics, the game was well-played and widely considered a huge success both on and off the court.

"This is all about building bridges," Dore says. "For our guys to come here and see teams from Palestine, Jordan and Israel all playing in the same gym, it doesn't get much better."

Maccabi Tel Aviv does it again

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEL AVIV — A basket by Jamie Arnold with 2.2 seconds left gave Maccabi Tel Aviv a stunning 80-78 come-from-behind victory over Hapoel Jerusalem in last week's final to earn its 47th Israel elite league basketball championship.

The perennial champion entered the game with far less confidence than previous years, particularly after it barely defeated Galil Elyon in the Final Four semifinal earlier in the week.

On the other hand, Hapoel, coming off an easy semifinal win over Bnei Hasharon, was confident of taking the double after having won the State Cup earlier this season.

And for most of the game, it looked like the Reds would pull it off.

Maccabi opened the game poorly, while Hapoel captain Meir Tapiro scored 10 first-quarter points to help give his team a 24-17 lead at the end of the period.

Maccabi turned things around a bit in the second quarter as Tapiro ran into foul trouble, but Hapoel stayed ahead throughout the period and took a 41-36 lead into the break.

After the intermission, Maccabi came out strong as Will Bynum, Tal Burstein and Nicola Vujcic took over. Maccabi captain Derek Sharp, meanwhile, kept the pressure on Tapiro.

And it was Sharp's drawing a controversial foul against Tapiro on a charge in the fourth quarter that sent Hapoel's captain off to the bench crying with his fifth foul. The critical call enabled the defending champion to stay close till the dramatic finish.

With five seconds remaining in the game and Jerusalem ahead 78-77, Maccabi's Sharon Sasson missed a jump shot, and it looked like the Reds would seal the victory. But Arnold grabbed the rebound and scored, while drawing a foul, to give the defending champion the victory.

Bynum led Maccabi with 18 points, followed by Burstein with 15, Vujcic with 13 and Sasson with 11.

Mario Austin led Jerusalem with 16 points and Horace Jenkins came off the bench to add 13 points.

But Tapiro was the team's true leader, with 14 points and five rebounds, and his absence in the game's final few minutes kept Jerusalem from pulling off the victory.

Tapiro was despondent after the game.

"Apparently it's impossible to win the championship," he said. "I'm storming with emotion now. One official took away the title. If they don't want a league here, they should enjoy it."

Giving seniors the respect they deserve

The Senior Side of Life

He was standing at the counter as I was leaving the local bakery. I had not seen him for awhile and wondered what had happened to him. He had been a regular volunteer and I always enjoyed speaking to him when our paths crossed.

"Where have you been? It's wonderful to see you," I greeted him as I filled my coffee cup at the checkout.

"I have been too busy helping my wife at home – she really needs me full time these days. I just don't have time to volunteer right now, even though I love doing it," he explained.

I recall years ago reading in the newspaper about the so called "bed blockers" – mainly frail, elderly people admitted to hospitals, who could not return home and were in acute care beds awaiting transfer to a long-term care facility. I recall a colleague complaining almost resentfully to me about "them" taking up "valuable" beds when all they needed was caretaking.

He was referring to individuals who could have been one of his parents but were certainly someone's loved one. He was referring to people who would have preferred to be in their own home with the necessary support from health-care professionals and their families, or in a long-term care facility appropriately staffed and suitable for them.

There has been a lot of negative media attention paid to the elderly recently – "they will drain the coffers," "soon all of our money will be going to pay for their needs." Almost from the onset of my career in geriatrics, my eldercare colleagues and I have been waging a constant uphill battle to present a humane, economically sound and civilized approach to providing the care and respect that our elders deserve.

So it was with great joy that we saw a study recently published by the HSBC Bank of Canada indicating that the elderly are major contributors to our society and our economy. It was such good news that I kept getting e-mail copies of it from colleagues.

The international study indicated that with the changing face of retirement, many seniors continue to work and fill important roles for which there are few adequately trained replacements. According to the study, working elders in Canada "between the ages of 60 and 79 contribute more than $2.2 billion each year in tax payments on employment income." The study suggested that in the future even more 60- to 79-year-olds and older intend to continue working either full or part time.

The economic benefit in Canada of seniors who volunteer approaches $3.1 billion, calculated by using the minimum wage multiplied by the number of hours served.

I have witnessed the wonderful contributions of volunteers at Baycrest's geriatric heath-care system, the institution with which I have been connected for more than 30 years. They support the clients with care, dedication and energy and are a vital complement to the care provided by employed staff members so that both groups together contribute to the elders' quality of life.

The HSBC Bank study also acknowledged the enormous human and economic contribution provided by seniors in the care of their own contemporary, older and younger family members. The major portion of eldercare is provided by family, including those who themselves are elderly.

For the seniors yourselves – hold your collective heads up high – you are vital to our society with all of your contributions. For those who make public policy – rethink your focus to maximize the opportunities for our elders to contribute to their families and our collective society.

We must always remember the corollary: when there is need for eldercare, it should be provided with dignity and respect, reflecting a truly caring society.

Explaining Jewish literacy

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

Recently, I have been writing and talking a great deal about Jewish literacy and identity as the ultimate goals of a good Jewish education. I have been asked what I mean by literacy, since the term is usually used in other contexts.

From a pluralist point of view, it's obvious that Jewish literacy will mean different things to different kinds of Jews. Indeed, there are elements of Jewish knowledge in the Liberal Jewish world that would be considered anti-knowledge in certain Orthodox circles, and beliefs that are considered fact in traditional circles that would be ridiculed in other groups.

That said, I would rather deal with process and form than struggle with the different contents. In both general studies and Jewish subjects, there are two important notions that can radically change the way we approach subject content and student mastery of it. They are both the work of the famous Harvard University psychologist Jerome Bruner, as described in two of his books, The Process of Education and On Knowing. One is "structure," the other is "discovery." In the short space of such a column, I can only briefly describe what Bruner meant by structure. (Discovery will have to wait!)

Bruner asserts that the structure of a given discipline should shape the way we study that subject. This means that in the study of Bible or Talmud, for example, while the actual content of a specific parshah or sugyah is important, the structure of such study and its internal reasoning are critical to further study and should mould the lesson in a certain way. Rashi's methodology for discerning pshat and drash are as important as any given commentary by him.

In the words of Bruner: "The first object of any act of learning, over and beyond the pleasure it may give, is that it should serve us in the future. Learning should… allow us to go further more easily."

A proper understanding of structure in the learning process can help our students achieve a more profound Jewish literacy in their adulthood, no matter what content we prefer.

Julius Ciss: a decisive Jew

URBAN WRITER

Julius Ciss is an old friend. I met him close to 20 years ago. From the outset, this jovial Jew made me laugh. Julius is a child of Holocaust survivors, so having an abundance of joy in his heart, being such a cheerful man, is very special.

Julius is also a very tall person, somewhat of an anomaly among his Jewish contemporaries. He stands above a crowd and can be heard at the other end of a room with his booming voice.

The thing I admire mostly about Julius, however, more than his drive and ability to light up a room, is his courage. Julius is indeed a brave man.

More than 30 years ago, he made a choice, one that was painful to those he loved, but he made it anyway, with the belief that he be true to himself.

For five years Julius was a member of a "Hebrew-Christian" community and adhered to their basic dogma, including a belief in Jesus as the messiah.

On the face of it, many people would be critical of his decision, because of our mistrust of Christianity and the tools used by Hebrew-Christians to convert Jews to their ways. But I am speaking of Julius's ability to make major changes in his life. He did so then, and he continues to do so today.

Julius is a decisive human being.

Ultimately, Julius left that lifestyle, according to the website of Jews for Judaism, because "he discovered the numerous inconsistencies in Christian belief."

Soon afterward, he did what few others have done. Angered by the devious conversion methods of Jews for Jesus and similar missionary organizations, Julius launched the Toronto branch of Jews for Judaism.

This move was not a simple one, as Julius was considered to be one of the finest illustrators in Canada, and his shift in career priorities definitely limited his ability to enhance his career as a commercial artist and a highly respected teacher at the Ontario College of Art and Design. But he made the move, and he did so with great enthusiasm.

For more than 18 years, Julius has painstakingly built the organization with the help of colleagues and volunteers. He speaks regularly in Canada, the United States and Israel, and he has produced counter-missionary literature and tapes and been engaged in one-on-one counselling with Hebrew Christians in an attempt to bring them back into the fold. If you were to shmooze with Julius, you would discover that he has saved many a soul over the years and has played a key role as a Jewish leader.

Julius is a good person. Throughout the years, he has faced many difficult challenges including the death of his mother and a brother. They were hard times, to say the least, but Julius seemed to manage life's hardships and challenges with grace and strength. I recall watching him and thinking what an inspiration he was, somebody I hope I can emulate when my time comes to deal with the difficulties of life.

Julius is a dedicated husband. His wife, Claire is equally committed to strengthening of the Jewish community. He is a father to Miriam, a very bright, inquisitive and lovely girl. He also introduced me to my dear friend and media partner, Marty Galin.

Life is complex and requires us to be valiant and decisive on a daily basis. This is not simple, but Julius often makes it seem so.

As the founding director of Jews for Judaism, a world class graphic artist, a loyal and loving father and husband, and a very good friend, and as a hilarious human being, Julius does indeed remind us that decent men are in our midst – people who pursue life with a vengeance and a desire to make our world shine. Julius is a decisive Jew and a very good man.

Shopping made easy for men of all ages

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

For most men, shopping for clothing is bad enough – shopping for special occasion clothing is a nightmare. Either the waist is too tight, the jacket is too long or the tie doesn't match. Thankfully, if you know where to shop, these problems simply do not exist.

Le Club Menswear (416-488-7848) caters to men of all ages, from boys to adults. Located at 424 Eglinton Ave. W. just west of Avenue Road, the boutique carries carefully selected clothing for casual, business, dress and formal occasions.

Le Club offers specialized wardrobe consultation services.

"We offer a one-stop shopping experience for all three generations," says owner Nadia Serraf.

In addition, Le Club offers specialized wardrobe consultation services. The staff can help clean up your existing attire as well as add to it, creating a more versatile and interesting wardrobe. "We go out of our way to create a unique and personal image," Serraf says.

Perfect for unifying a business wardrobe or simplifying vacation packing, Le Club's consultation services can be customized for special occasions such as weddings and bar mitzvahs.

"We can dress an entire wedding party to compliment each other without having any two men wearing the same thing," Serraf says.

Carrying everything from lightweight polos and linen pants to leather outerwear, Serraf cites the return to a lean look as one of the biggest fashion trends in the store. Stripes, stripes and more stripes, in colours such as aqua and burnt orange, will make this look stand out from the rest. For more information about Le Club, visit www.leclubmenswear.com.

Another option for men of all ages is Crawford Boys (416-782- 8137). Located at 508-A Lawrence Ave. W., in Lawrence Plaza, Crawford is primarily known for its expertise in special occasion boyswear. But in response to popular demand, Crawford has also introduced men's suits and casualwear this year.

"We have had so many requests from customers who want to continue shopping with us," says Crawford owner Paul Spiar. "This way, not only can the older boys shop with us, but their father can shop with us [as] well."

With this new addition, Crawford can cater to even more men's sizes than before. Husky boys' sizes 10-20 can be combined with men's sizes to achieve a perfect fit. "Because we specialize in this area, we can develop the concept and stock the clothes extremely quickly," Spiar says.

Among the strongest looks in the store, he says, a more relaxed and unstructured silhouette is the most prominent at the moment. "This is a new direction in menswear continuing into fall and we're hopping on it." Spiar says.

New Arrivals

This means that a dress shirt may be combined with casual clothing such as jeans. "The dress shirt has really got to stand up on its own these days, and we are trying to carry as many of them as possible. I truly do not think anyone carries more shirts than us," Spiar says with a laugh.

Patterned and striped shirts in bright colours like fuchsia and orange are absolutely sizzling at the moment. For fall, Spiar predicts that corduroy will be the dominant look for outerwear.

"Above all, the most important asset to the store is the staff," says Spiar. "We all understand that the most important person in the store is the person who walks through the front door."

For more information about Crawford Boys, visit www.crawfordboys.com.

With stores like Le Club Menswear and Crawford Boys, the shopping landscape for both boys and men is looking good in Toronto.

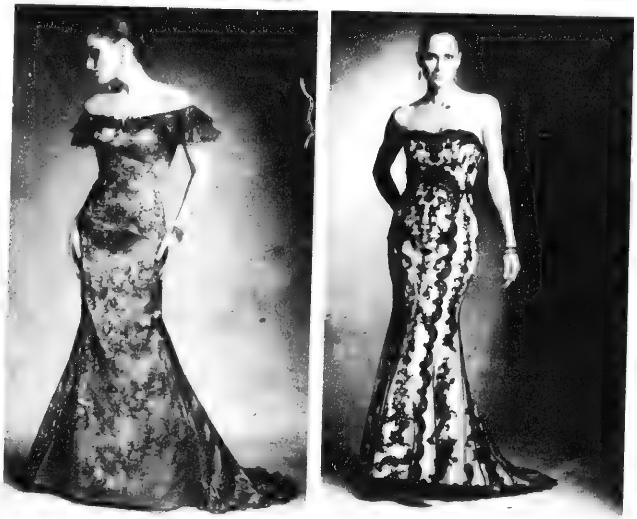
ABC's of Dress shopping



Edith's Fashions carries a large selection of ladies' formalwear.

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

As the summer of simchahs quickly approaches, the most important thought that comes to mind (okay, perhaps only for the ladies) is "what am I going to wear!" To help in your search for the perfect outfit, we've scouted two of the best boutiques in the city.

With one of the largest selection of ladies' formalwear and gowns in the country, Edith's Fashions (416-633-4222) has built up quite a reputation in its 25 years of business. Located at 245 Wilmington Ave., the two-floor, 8,000-square-foot space has all the flavour of a downtown boutique with the accessibility of an uptown location.

"We like to make our customers feel like a million dollars," says owner Joe Nourani. "You'd never be able to carry such a large range of quality clothes at a downtown address."

At Edith's, you will be greeted with a friendly and expert salespeople who truly understand formalwear. "Most importantly, they do not work on commission, so when they come to serve you, they are only interested in helping you look your best," says Nourani.

Edith's Fashions has something for everyone. Not only does the boutique carry unique and fashionable gowns and suiting but a small but carefully chosen bridal collection as well.

"Most likely, when someone comes into the store to look for a dress, they leave with one or two outfits," says Nourani. Among the hottest trends in the store at the moment, Nourani cites a return to glamorous gowns – especially in sage green and coffee brown. "We say that brown is the new black," he says.

Perhaps most importantly, the clothing at Edith's can be altered to fit every size. "A gown never fits 100 per cent off the rack, and once you've spent the money, it should be perfect." says Nourani.

"We have six expert seamstresses on the premises that are available to tailor the dress to your body." To allow for a more modest look, sleeves can also be added and hems can be extended.

"People fly in from all over the country for special occasions, and we can fit, alter and have the dress ready for pick up within one day," says Nourani.

Another fabulous place to search for a special occasion outfit is Madeline's (416-789-4890). Located at 1841 Avenue Rd., Madeline's carries a wide range of ladies' eveningwear, from cocktail dresses to custom-made bridal gowns. While the eveningwear is imported from France, Spain, Italy and New York, including designer names such as Bagley and Mishka and Carmen Marc Valvo, the collection of bridal dresses is specially designed by Madeline herself.

"The bridal gowns are like my babies," Madeline Cerra says, laughing. "The dresses are all hand-beaded, and I use only the best silks and laces."

Carrying ready-to-wear dresses in sizes 2 to 18 and 26 by special order, Madeline's can adapt them to fit any body type.

As well, Cerra takes pride in the superb quality of the store's alterations and custom work. "Our seamstresses are absolutely amazing," she says. Madeline's also carries a selection of jewelry chosen to perfectly compliment the clothes.

Opened more than three years ago by the husband and wife team of Nick and Madeline Cerra, the store had always been the couple's dream. "My husband has always been an expert in the fashion business, and I am a graduate of fashion design from the International Academy of Design," says Cerra. "We are really passionate about what we do, so combining our interests into opening the store was made to be."

The atmosphere at Madeline's is just the kind that makes you comfortable enough to shop, shop, shop! "We really love dressing the customer," says Cerra. "The environment in the store reflects that."

The perfect dress or outfit for a special occasion can prove to be disaster if you aren't careful where you shop. Lost in a sea of silk, lace and tulle, you might just get stuck in a lime green bustier. With the help of Edith's Fashions and Madeline's, you'll look simply fantastic.

Park Hyatt has kosher kitchen and on-site mashgiach

By DEBORAH STERESCU
Special to The CJN

The Park Hyatt hotel in Toronto is fully equipped for the Jewish community of Toronto, with a kosher kitchen and an on-site mashgiach.

The kosher kitchen is capable of creating any menu style that is desired, as the kitchen can customize any menu. Some popular menu items include the oven-poached halibut and the roast beef ribeye.

Nick Pratpas, the director of catering at the Park Hyatt (416-925-1234) , says, "People rave about our attention to detail… personal touches bring everyone back."

It is this "personal" aspect that will satisfy the customers' needs, whether it is in the kitchen or on the dance floor. Lighting, for example, can be adjusted to any temperature or colour, according to the customer's wishes.

The Roof Salon, the Park Hyatt's most popular room, has a wrap-around balcony that overlooks breathtaking views of the city and is able to hold 130 people comfortably on the dance floor. The slightly larger space available, the Queen's Park Ballroom, holds from 270 to 280 people.

The Park Hyatt typically does not charge for the space when food and beverage are included, which is a bonus when considering a place to throw your party.

Couples who hold their wedding receptions at the Park Hyatt receive many gifts, including two-night complimentary accommodation for their anniversary at any Park Hyatt worldwide and accommodation overnight on the day of the wedding in an upgraded suite. Free his/her body massage and spa services are provided.

A room at the Park Hyatt Hotel.

The Park Hyatt's on-site wedding specialists will help plan every detail from the rehearsal dinner and the Sunday morning brunch to the ceremony of your dreams, flowers and music.

If the bride and groom are looking to be pampered, Park Hyatt will ensure they are.

Summer months are the busiest season for the Park Hyatt, so booking time can range anywhere from two days to two years in advance, depending on availability.

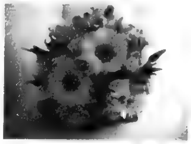
Flowers bring more than just colour to an event

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

Floral designs for a simchah such as a wedding or a bar or bat mitzvah are as unique as the clients are, say two of Toronto's veteran florists.



"I want to make sure that everyone has [left a] stamp of who they are [for their event]… that's what makes [every event] unique," said Fran Sackler of Fran Sackler Floral Designs. "[The looks are] not from a book. I don't have anyone come here and have a look through magazines and books to find something they want."

Speaking of weddings, Sackler, who was trained in London's West End in the early 1960s, always schedules a consultation with the prospective client that lasts from one to three hours.

"We sit down and go through everything that the bride likes, [as well as] her dislikes, her colours. We discuss what the gown is like – all these little important things," she said.

"[We do this, so as not to] go with something that will totally clash with what [the bride] is wearing."

Sackler added that it's important to go over such details thoroughly because not all colours go well together and because it's critical that the flowers compliment the bride.

An industry veteran, Sackler was the florist for William Ashley China in Toronto from 1994 until 2004 and does flower arrangements for synagogues such as Beth Tzedec Congregation in Toronto.

She describes her style as "European traditional" or "English garden, pretty and elegant," and she favours traditional flowers, her favourite being orchids as well as freesias.

"[Freesias] are beautiful, old and traditional. They smell so beautiful – it has this light peppery scent. It lasts about two weeks," she said. "It [encompasses] everything that I love most about a flower: it's a simple bit of elegance with a classic scent."

Karen Baker, of Designs by Karen Baker has been working her magic with flowers and room décor for 20 years.

She decorated the stage for singer Barbara Streisand's recent concert in Toronto and has also worked for other celebrities, including singers Mariah Carey and Christina Aguilera, and Toronto Maple Leafs captain Mats Sundin.

"I have done a lot of private parties and interesting events over the years. I've tried to keep up with the designs – what is contemporary and what people are looking for," Baker said.

"My style would be [described as] 'creative.' It would be what is happening now."

The current trend, she said, is a "minimalist look," which she describes as a "combination of the western look and the eastern look, and also what suits the client's needs and what fits the design of the venue."

For a romantic look, Baker suggests roses, stocks and lisianthus. For a more contemporary look, Baker likes antheriums and calla lilies, together with unusually shaped branches, for example.

When doing bar or bat mitzvah parties, Baker encourages the direct involvement of the child.

"Especially the girls. They have an idea of what they want to do, so I prefer, sort of like the bride, that they come prepared with their colours and [idea of what they want] and then I'll talk to them," she said. "I think that… if [the kids] choose to get involved, then they really get a rush out of it when they go to their own party."

Baker said the trick with pulling a look together is colour.

"[What is important is] how you display your colour and how you balance your room with colour. It doesn't matter what colour it is, it's how it's worked in the room," she said. "I think no matter how you do it, the whole room falls into place."

Décor gives your party a unique look and feel

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

When guests come to your party, you want them to revel in the ambience.

Having creative décor is one of the best ways to make that happen.

From the centrepieces and gift baskets to memento books and party favour giveaways, there are many pieces to the décor puzzle, all of which serve to give your party a unique look and feel.

Shelley Herzog and Reesa Nussbaum.

With themed parties becoming especially trendy, décor specialists look to customize their products for whatever it is the client wants.

"Rather than doing cookie cutter [décor], we personalize it," says Tammy Heisel of Artistic Creations, a party planning and decorating company that's been in business for 14 years.

"With bar or bat mitzvahs, it's really all about what the kid's likes or interests are, and we try to emphasize that."

For instance, if a bar or bar mitzvah kid is particularly interested in a certain sport or has a favourite hobby, décor experts will display that theme in various creative ways.

"For a recent bat mitzvah with a shopping theme, instead of doing place cards, everyone is getting a little shopping bag with different kinds of items inside," notes Shelley Herzog of Party Hat.

"And we'll use all kinds of props, such as store names all over the walls and lamp posts everywhere, so it looks like you're in the mall."

Both Herzog and Heisel encourage people to rely on word of mouth to find a décor vendor, and they also say that the best specialists are those who work closely with clients.

"I like to meet with the clients as much as possible and have the child involved," says Heisel.

"If they really like hockey, but don't know what to do with it in terms of a theme, I will do up a drawing for them that gives an idea of what the room would look like. I also invite them to come to other parties to see things I've done."

Herzog says she will frequently provide three or four samples to help clients choose their décor styles and theme.

"Customer service is key," she says.

"When you're choosing a vendor, you have to find one who is going to listen to you and [follows the dictum that] the customer is always right."

Just as parties tend to be held during specific seasons, décor supplies are also more readily available at certain times of the year, so Herzog encourages clients to book about six months in advance.

Bellvue Manor Hall will offer country elegance

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

Imagine holding a simchah at a grand country estate with a stone entrance way, French doors and a great hall with intricate mouldings, chandeliers and a 30-foot ceiling.

This country elegance is the ambiance you'll find at Bellvue Manor (905-851-2325), a new banquet hall slated to open in September.

Located at 8083 Jane St., two lights north of Highway 7, Bellvue Manor boasts a grand ballroom that can accommodate up to 1,000 people for dinner and dancing. The room can also be divided into three separate rooms for parties for up to 300 to 350 people, says owner Nancy Marra.

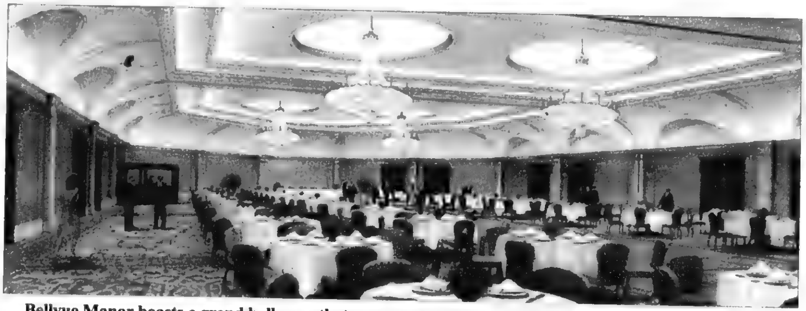
She and her husband Robert have been in the banquet business for 22 years and have catered to the Jewish community at The Royalton, their banquet facility on Weston Road north of Highway 7.

"Bellvue Manor is our latest venture," she says.

She urges people looking for an elegant ballroom with kosher facilities and "state-of-the-art lighting and sound" to visit the website at www.bellvuemanor.com

For parties of 150 to 200 people, Marra recommends a smaller room at Bellvue Manor called The Library. "It has its own entrance, wood panelling and a fireplace. It offers a cozier and more intimate setting."

She notes that she and her husband will be able to offer their Jewish clients a more extensive kosher menu, because the Bellvue Manor will be equipped with a kosher kitchen. The kosher caterer will be Tiara Culinary Creations.



Bellvue Manor boasts a grand ballroom that can accommodate up to 1,000 people for dinner and dancing.

Aside from the elegant surroundings, food has always been a big draw for people using the Royalton, says Marra, noting that its executive chef, Vince Bava, will be working at Bellvue manor.

"He specializes in Italian, but he's known for international cuisine. He trained in California. He's known for his prime rib, but his chicken and salmon are amazing too," she says.

"His sauces are unbelievable, and that's what makes the meal, because the average person doesn't have the training in sauce-making. Vince cooks in the kosher kitchen preparing prime rib or his other beef specialties. The mashgiach is always present making sure they follow every dietary law."

Generally, people opt for a four- or five-course meal that usually includes soup, salad, pasta – a house specialty – and sometimes a fish course, Marra says.

☐ Fully Kosher Facility
☑ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
☑ Capacity up to 100 People
☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
☑ Over 300 Person Capacity

"We have a full menu for any occasion. We customize the menu to the function," she adds.

"We can also accommodate vegetarian and people with special dietary needs. There are celiacs, who can't eat wheat, and people are lactose intolerant. We try to accommodate as best we can."

Before the meal guests can enjoy a variety or food stations or the antipasto bar, Marra says.

"We're known for the antipasto bar, appetizer items like grilled vegetables and smoked salmon served like a buffet instead of hors d'oeuvres."

She describes her food stations as "very innovative." Popular stations include cut corn beef stations and mashed potato stations with the potatoes served with toppings in martini glasses

Their martini bars are always a big hit, Marra says. "We can customize a martini bar for you. We do the classics like vodka martinis, or cosmopolitans or a chocolate martini. We do all the different fruits as martinis. Watermelon is nice in the summer time."

All meals include the cost of alcohol and a sweet table, she says. "We do lavish sweet tables with luscious deserts and lots of fresh fruit. We have chocolate fountains and our newest dessert, a molten chocolate lava cake, is incredible."

Aside from Old World elegance and great food, Bellvue Manor provides personalized attention from people with years of hospitality service experience, says Marra.

"My husband and I are a tag team. We offer a real personal touch. Our maitre d' has been with us for many years. We keep it all personal by being present at all our events.

"That's the fulfilling part of our work, when all the planning is over and we get to see people enjoying themselves. When the bride is dancing with her father, that's always a soft spot for my husband.

"After the wedding when everything has turned out wonderfully, it is so nice to see how happy people are, especially the parents. This is a once-in-a-lifetime event for our clients. and we make sure the affair is very special."

Kosher simchahs in an upscale setting at Gladstone's

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD

Special to The CJN

Gino Falcitelli may not see himself as the manager of a kosher restaurant because for years, he wasn't. But just as he did back then, he offers "fine dining cuisine, with the best service, best ambience, best quality of food" – only now in a strictly kosher setting.

During Falcitelli's more than two years with Gladstone's Wine Bar and Grill (398 Eglinton Ave. W., 416-487-9500, www.gladstones.ca), the restaurant has become known as a showpiece of the local community. Customers not only return, but come back with non-Jewish friends, clients and colleagues to show what a fine dining experience ought to be.

Gladstone's distinctive touch starts with the meat. "People say, 'I don't understand; I've been to a place that gets the same meat, and it tastes completely different.'"

That's because, whether it's for a simchah or an individual diner's meal, the meat is carefully aged for about three weeks in a special cooler. Falcitelli says carrying a large inventory does make the meat more expensive, and that's why most restaurants skip the process. "The overhead is very high." But it's worth it. "Enzymes in the meat break down the toughness of it… Our clients reap the benefits – it's very tender."

Gladstone's most popular items are steak and prime rib, available for dining room customers and private events ranging from full-scale weddings (including on-site ceremonies with chupah) and bar mitzvahs, to more casual functions like Sheva Brachot and even corporate events,

A striking Hollywood staircase divides the restaurant into an upstairs mezzanine and downstairs dining area so that it can accommodate events of many sizes, from more than 300 diners occupying the entire restaurant to smaller functions of 30 to 50 people.

The upstairs dining room also has high-tech facilities for business meetings: full Internet access and a large-screen plasma display, along with the services of Gladstone's expert chef, who can customize the menu to any tastes and help guests avoid the feeling of "been-there, done-that."

"Every time someone comes in for a function, it's something different. One company recently said, 'We want you to wow us.'" Gladstone's rose to the occasion with a brand new "stuffed steak" entrée incorporating mushrooms and red peppers.
